MSP PERSPECTIVES

The Rise of Indo-Pacific Multilateral Naval Diplomacy

Ristian Atriandi Supriyanto
Associate Research Fellow, Maritime Security Programme

A glance into recent international exercises and fleet reviews in the Indian and Pacific Oceans (Indo-Pacific) suggests a growing appetite for multilateral naval diplomacy. The 2014 MILAN and MALABAR exercises, the Indonesian Navy (TNI-AL) Exercise KOMODO, and the 2014 RIMPAC exercise are only a few that attest to that growth. Ranging from naval exercises to international fleet reviews and disaster relief operations, why is there seemingly a growing appetite for multilateral naval diplomacy?

Simply defined, naval diplomacy is the use of naval force to support foreign policy. In its multilateral form, naval diplomacy involves more than two navies at one time. Activities of naval diplomacy can range from port 'goodwill visits' and disaster relief operations to counter-piracy and assertions of sovereignty in disputed waters. The latter activity can be called 'gunboat diplomacy,' described by James Cable as 'the use of threat of limited naval force, other than as an act of war.' Participation in multilateral naval diplomacy can thus convey mixed political messages of fame, friendship, and fear.

Fame. Navies participate in multilateral naval diplomacy because they want to show or demonstrate their might and pride to their peers. A warship can be as much a fighting instrument as it is a national symbol. Might and pride may partly account for Indian and Chinese ambitions to build a blue-water navy demonstrated by indigenous developments of aircraft carriers. Similarly, Malaysia's and Indonesia's drives for naval modernisation are partially motivated by their desires to become a 'world class navy' with new acquisitions of frigates and submarines. Displaying might and pride through multilateral naval diplomacy can also create a 'demonstration effect' to be aware of one's own weaknesses and/or superior capabilities as compared to other navies. This can provide the incentive for capability-improvement, such as through increases in naval expenditure or acquisitions of new platforms.

Friendship. Apart from gaining fame, participation in multilateral naval diplomacy is sought to win friends. Naval diplomacy can demonstrate the cooperative dimension of navies and dispel trust deficits perceived to exist among them. Naval cooperation can be both a means and an end in itself to build, and show existing, trust between navies, such as fleet reviews. Friendship can simultaneously improve interoperability between navies. Transnational problems like piracy or natural disasters require not only a whole-of-government, but across-governmental approach. By exercising or working together, navies can learn lessons and establish a pattern of expectations from one another. When a contingency arises (be it a tsunami or hijacked tanker), navies know what to expect from each other in order to mount an effective collective response.

Fear. Notwithstanding its peaceful purposes, participation in multilateral naval diplomacy can belie intentions. For one, 'coalition-building' naval diplomacy can display resolve to deter foes, such as through joint exercises. Perceiving a containment, China protested the 2007 MALABAR exercise involving the US, India, Singapore, and Australia. By the same token, naval exercises are a way to collect intelligence on a potential adversary. Being a participant in the 2014 RIMPAC exercise didn't stop China from sending a surveillance ship to spy on the exercise held in the vicinity of Hawaii. On the other hand, fear can motivate 'crisis management' naval diplomacy. Naval skirmishes in response to maritime territorial and boundary disputes are a potential of miscalculation and misunderstanding. States fear that competitive naval assertions of sovereignty in disputed waters could precipitate protracted crises, if not inadvertent conflict.

Despite their increasing salience, a big question lingers on whether multilateral naval diplomacy actually contributes towards greater regional stability. Not only can naval diplomacy build trust and enhance interoperability, but it can also conceal malign intent. The efficacy of naval diplomacy will, however, remain. At its least, participation in multilateral naval diplomacy allows deeper insights into how naval counterparts (allies, friends, or potential foes) think and behave.

Japan announces a military shift to thwart China

TOKYO — Japan's prime minister announced a reinterpretation of the country's pacifist Constitution on Tuesday, freeing its military for the first time in over 60 years to play a more assertive role in the increasingly tense region. The decision by the government of Prime Minister Shinzo Abe will permit Japan to use its large and technologically advanced armed forces in ways that would have been unthinkable even a decade ago when they were limited to defending the country.
