MSP PERSPECTIVES

The New U.S. Maritime Strategy: Some Regional Implications

Sam Bateman

Adviser and Senior Fellow, Maritime Security Programme

The new U.S. Maritime Strategy "A Cooperative Strategy for 21st Century Seapower: Forward, Engaged, Ready", was released recently by the chiefs of America's "sea services" – the U.S. Navy, Coast Guard, and Marine Corps. The previous Maritime Strategy issued in 2007 gave considerable attention to maritime cooperation with friends and allies. It became the basis for the 1,000-ship Navy concept and the Global Maritime Partnership Initiative. The latest Strategy has similar sentiments, but they are not its cornerstone – rather it gives greater attention to threats, forward naval presence, and the concepts of deterrence, sea control and power projection. Overall it is much more militant document.

The Strategy is intended to reassure friends and allies of U.S. commitments and to give potential adversaries something to think about. It is also intended to justify the Navy's budget. It notes that the Navy's current budget submission will provide for more than 300 ships and a forward presence of about 120 ships by 2020, up from an average of 97 in 2014. 60 percent of these ships will be assigned to the Asia-Pacific region, including more Littoral Combat Ships and Ballistic-Missile-Defense (BMD) vessels. These plans add weight to the military dimensions of Washington's re-balance to Asia.

Unlike the 2007 Strategy, the words "trust" and "confidence" do not occur in the new document in a strategic context. While the Asia-Pacific region is characterised by high levels of strategic distrust, it would seem that the U.S. Navy is not much interested in trust- or confidence-building. There is nothing in the new Maritime Strategy that will ease the strategic distrust that exists at present between the U.S. and China. Both countries are talking past each other. The new Strategy does not help this situation. It risks adding to the security dilemma between the two countries.

As a small example of what might be possible with naval confidence-building, current U.S. regulations prohibiting the attendance of Chinese military officers at American military institutions and staff colleges, such as the Naval War College, might be relaxed. During his speech at the International Maritime Security Conference in Singapore in 2013, Admiral Wu Shengli, the Chief of the Chinese Navy, suggested more exchanges between the younger generation of military officers to help build trust and understanding for the future. Current U.S. policy runs against that. Similarly, trust between the Chinese and U.S. navies was not helped recently when the U.S. Navy knocked back an invitation from China for a USN aircraft carrier to visit China while at the same time, entering into a joint arrangement with India to develop aircraft carrier technology.

Despite the rhetoric about a global network of like-minded navies, there is no reference in the latest Strategy to the 1982 UN Convention on the Law of the Sea (UNCLOS) and the framework that provides for cooperation. Instead the references to "international waters" and "global commons" may be seen as an attempt to deny extended forms of coastal State jurisdiction allowed under UNCLOS. The seas of East Asia, for example, are not "international waters", or part of the "maritime commons". Rather they are the exclusive economic zones (EEZs) of the littoral States which have important rights and duties in those seas, as well as an obligation to cooperate in their management. The fact that the U.S. is not a party to UNCLOS remains a significant limitation on the ability it seeks to exercise leadership in the maritime domain.

The new Maritime Strategy may help to re-assure U.S. friends and allies in the region. It also provides justification for the naval budget in the face of sequestration and budgetary competition. However, with its clear focus on power projection and the ability to assert access to contested waters, it may also have the unwelcome consequence of adding to distrust between China and the U.S. and the security dilemma for both countries.

This item is based on a commentary in The Strategist published on 20 March 2015.

Japanese navy gets biggest flat-top since WWII-era aircraft carriers

Japan's Maritime Self Defense Force on Wednesday took delivery of the biggest Japanese warship since World War Two, the Izumo, a helicopter carrier as big as the Imperial Navy aircraft carriers that battled the United States in the Pacific. The Izumo with a crew of 470 sailors is a highly visible example of how Japan is expanding the capability of its military to operate overseas and enters service as Prime Minister Shinzo Abe seeks lawmaker approval to loosen the restraints of Japan's pacifist post-war constitution.
