Recent media reports have suggested that Southeast Asia is now the major global ‘hot spot’ for global piracy and armed robbery against ships. That may be true in terms of absolute numbers of reported attacks, but before making sweeping statements about the seriousness of piracy in the region, it is necessary to look more closely at the figures. Of the 150 or so actual and attempted attacks in the region in 2014, about two-thirds involved ships at anchor or in port while about 60 per cent were categorised as relatively minor or as incidents of petty theft. All the most serious attacks involved the hijacking of small product tankers and the actual or attempted theft of some or all of their oil cargos.

Three factors are important considerations – how serious is an attack in terms of level of violence involved or economic loss incurred; the type and size of vessel attacked; and whether or not the vessel was underway or stopped at anchor or in port. Without appreciating these factors, it is impossible to make realistic assessments of the nature of the threat and the counter-measures required.

Many reported incidents constitute either petty theft or unsuccessful attempts to board. These may have gone unreported in the past, but are now reported due to the publicity given to piracy and greater awareness of the reporting channels available. Rather than an under-reporting of attacks due to concerns of ship masters about the insurance implications of attacks or possible delays due to subsequent investigations, over reporting could well be the case. Statistics may also be inflated by ships reporting any close approach by small craft as an ‘attempted attack’.

Any ship may be attacked while stopped if the appropriate precautions are not taken and vigilance exercised. Attacks on vessels underway are more illuminating in terms of causal factors related to particular types of vessel, and actions required to provide greater security. The vulnerability of a ship underway depends on factors such as ship size, speed, freeboard and size of crew with small ships much more vulnerable than larger vessels. The vulnerability of a ship at anchor, stopped or in port does not depend on its size and type.

Two organisations in the region collect data on incidents of piracy and sea robbery – the Information Sharing Centre (ISC) established in Singapore by the Regional Cooperation Agreement on Combating Piracy and Armed Robbery against Ships in Asia (ReCAAP), and the Kuala Lumpur-based Piracy Reporting Centre (PRC) of the International Maritime Bureau (IMB). These are very different organisations – the PRC is a private sector initiative funded by shipping interests, particularly the insurance sector, while ReCAAP is a governmental organisation. The PRC was established in 1991 but the ISC was not operational until 2006.

ReCAAP classifies each incident of piracy and sea robbery according to level of violence and economic loss involved. The PRC, however, does not classify incidents and counts an incident of petty theft from a ship at anchor as equivalent to a major incident of ship hijacking. With the greater majority of incidents in the region being ones of petty theft, the PRC’s reports can give a distorted picture of the threat of piracy. The media with its preference for ‘bad news’ stories tends to use the absolute figures presented by the PRC rather than the more nuanced reports from ReCAAP.

ReCAAP provides authoritative advice both to governments and industry on the actions necessary to counter the threat of piracy and sea robbery. It is important to get these responses correct to ensure the best use of limited national capacities.

The shipping industry has been calling for additional patrolling at sea and some navies have promoted the idea of joint patrols of areas where attacks are occurring. These would help but countering piracy is not that simple. Concerted action is required by others with a stake in eliminating piracy and sea robbery – shipowners must ensure their ships follow best security management practices – providing this security is a cost of ‘doing business’ for industry; close cooperation is required by regional police forces, port authorities and customs authorities; national maritime administrations must ensure vessels flying their national flag are complying with the International Ship and Port Facility Security Code, and conduct inspections of visiting ships to confirm compliance with this Code; and port authorities must take action to ensure the security of ports and anchorages under their control.

While it is rarely acknowledged in media commentaries, greater security in ports and anchorages prone to attacks is one of the most pressing requirements to reduce the incidence of piracy and sea robbery in the region. In this regard, recent initiatives by Indonesia, including designating recommended anchorage areas off key ports that are more actively patrolled, are to be welcomed.
