

The RSIS Working Paper series presents papers in a preliminary form and serves to stimulate comment and discussion. The views expressed are entirely the author's own and not that of the S. Rajaratnam School of International Studies. If you have any comments, please send them to the following email address: isjwlin@ntu.edu.sg.

Unsubscribing

If you no longer want to receive RSIS Working Papers, please click on "Unsubscribe." to be removed from the list.

No. 206

From Empire to the War on Terror:
The 1915 Indian Sepoy Mutiny in Singapore
as a case study of the impact of profiling of religious and ethnic minorities.

Farish A. Noor

S. Rajaratnam School of International Studies

Singapore

30 July 2010

About RSIS

The S. Rajaratnam School of International Studies (RSIS) was established in January 2007 as an autonomous School within the Nanyang Technological University. RSIS' mission is to be a leading research and graduate teaching institution in strategic and international affairs in the Asia-Pacific. To accomplish this mission, RSIS will:

- Provide a rigorous professional graduate education in international affairs with a strong practical and area emphasis
- Conduct policy-relevant research in national security, defence and strategic studies, diplomacy and international relations
- Collaborate with like-minded schools of international affairs to form a global network of excellence

Graduate Training in International Affairs

RSIS offers an exacting graduate education in international affairs, taught by an international faculty of leading thinkers and practitioners. The teaching programme consists of the Master of Science (MSc) degrees in Strategic Studies, International Relations, International Political Economy and Asian Studies as well as The Nanyang MBA (International Studies) offered jointly with the Nanyang Business School. The graduate teaching is distinguished by their focus on the Asia-Pacific region, the professional practice of international affairs and the cultivation of academic depth. Over 150 students, the majority from abroad, are enrolled with the School. A small and select Ph.D. programme caters to students whose interests match those of specific faculty members.

Research

Research at RSIS is conducted by five constituent Institutes and Centres: the Institute of Defence and Strategic Studies (IDSS), the International Centre for Political Violence and Terrorism Research (ICPVTR), the Centre of Excellence for National Security (CENS), the Centre for Non-Traditional Security (NTS) Studies, and the Temasek Foundation Centre for Trade and Negotiations (TFCTN). The focus of research is on issues relating to the security and stability of the Asia-Pacific region and their implications for Singapore and other countries in the region. The School has three professorships that bring distinguished scholars and practitioners to teach and do research at the School. They are the S. Rajaratnam Professorship in Strategic Studies, the Ngee Ann Kongsi Professorship in International Relations, and the NTUC Professorship in International Economic Relations.

International Collaboration

Collaboration with other Professional Schools of international affairs to form a global network of excellence is a RSIS priority. RSIS will initiate links with other like-minded schools so as to enrich its research and teaching activities as well as adopt the best practices of successful schools.

ABSTRACT

This paper looks at some of the unintended consequences of religious and ethnic profiling of minorities that took place during the colonial era, and which in 1915 led to a mutiny by Indian Sepoys then stationed in Singapore. The 1915 mutiny later complicated inter-ethnic relations in the colony, and may have been one of the factors that contributed to the mobilization of Indian Muslims against British rule in Asia later. Today, the dynamics of the global “War on Terror” bears uncanny resemblances to the Indian Sepoy Mutiny in Singapore in 1915. Both reflect the dynamics of oppositional dialectics and the impact of racial-religious profiling on the identity of Muslims across the globe. They incur the politics of “othering” Muslims, which require them to choose between loyalty to their nation/state/empire and their ethno-religious community. A side effect is the sharpening of boundaries between the Western and Muslim worlds.

Dr. Farish A. Noor is presently Senior Fellow at the S. Rajaratnam School of International Studies, Nanyang Technological University; where he is part of the research cluster ‘Transnational Religion in Southeast Asia’.

He has also worked at the Centre for Modern Orient Studies (ZMO), Berlin; and taught at Freie University Berlin, the Institute for the Study of Islam in the Modern World (ISIM), Leiden; and Sciences-Po, Paris and has served as Affiliated Professor at Muhamadiyah University, Surakarta and Sunan Kalijaga Islamic University, Jogjakarta.

He is the author of The Madrasa in Asia: Political Activism and Transnational Linkages. (With Martin van Bruinessen and Yoginder Sikand (Eds.), University of Amsterdam Press, Amsterdam, 2008; and Islam Embedded: The Historical Development of the Pan-Malaysian Islamic Party PAS: 1951-2003, Malaysian Sociological Research Institute (MSRI), Kuala Lumpur, 2004. His other writings include: Writings on the War on Terror (Globalmedia Press, India, 2006), From Majapahit to Putrajaya: Searching For Another Malaysia (Silverfish Books, Kuala Lumpur, 2005), Islam Progresif: Peluang, Tentangan dan Masa Depan di Asia Tenggara (SAMHA, Jogjakarta, 2005), Di San Zhi Yan Kan Ma Lai Xi Ya (Sin Chew Jit Poh Press, Petaling Jaya, 2004), The Other Malaysia: Writings on Malaysia's Subaltern History (Silverfish Books, Kuala Lumpur, 2003); and New Voices of Islam, (International Institute for the Study of Islam in the Modern World, Leiden, Netherlands, 2002).

Email: farishahmadnoor@yahoo.co.uk

From Empire to the War on Terror: The 1915 Indian Sepoy Mutiny in Singapore as a case study of the impact of profiling of religious and ethnic minorities.

I. Introduction: How not to lose friends and make new enemies

Any talk of a War on Terror necessarily leads us to some form of oppositional dialectics or another; and one that is couched in terms that are bellicose to boot. However, oppositional dialectics—and dialectics in general—has to be understood for what it is: a bipolar relationship, framed in terms of violent hierarchies, where a process of othering the Other is necessary for that oppositional dialectics to get off the ground in the first place. This poses a number of conceptual and theoretical problems that serve as the starting point for the enquiry we will attempt in this paper.

Firstly, it ought to be noted that such violent dialectics necessarily involves the framing of the Other in negative terms, which in turn sets the tone of the violent opposition/contestation between the same and the other. This, however, means that the negative Other also serves as a constitutive Other without which the Self/same cannot be framed. Dialectics of any kind necessitates this mutually-dependent form of bipolarity for the dialectics to work, and as such the Other, even when configured in negative oppositional terms, is the condition of possibility for the Self/same to be identified for what it is.

Secondly, the fact that the constitutive Other, even though framed in negative terms, is the constitutive Other means that it is bound up in the discursive economy of the same as well. The Other, in any oppositional dialectical relationship, is never and can never be radically outside the economy of the same, for the simple reason that it would otherwise not be able to play that role as the constitutive Other against which the Self/same is framed. We therefore need to remind ourselves that in all oppositional dialectical relations, the Other is often an inversed mirror reflection of the Self/same.

Thirdly, the nature of such violent dialectical relations entails that the framing of such dialectical relationships also often requires the framing of two separate but oppositional chains of equivalences, whereby that, which is deemed positive, is discursively associated with a range of other positive attributes, ideas and values. Conversely, that, which is opposed, is likewise discursively linked to a host of other negative values, ideas, tropes and symbols as well. Violent oppositional dialectics often leads us to the contestation of two different chains of equivalences.

Taking into account the factors above, a close look at the discourse on the War on Terror has operated more or less along the now-familiar routes of many other oppositional dialectical relationships: Notwithstanding the fact that the signifier “terror” has rarely been ostensibly defined with clear-cut empirical referents, the discourse itself has now gained currency in international political, security and academic circles. Yet the vagueness of the concept of terror does not and has not deterred it from gaining instrumental value among policymakers the world over. If we were to adopt the position taken by Edward Said in some of his writings, we can tentatively agree with the view that the vagueness of the concept of the War on Terror is not a hindrance to its utility as it still does serve the role of an instrumental fiction that can animate politics and be used as a justification and rationale for modes of policymaking and political behaviour. Ironically, one does not have to clearly define what terror is in order to declare war on it—despite the semantic clumsiness of the phrase.

What can be said and written about with some degree of certainty are the spill-over effects of the War on Terror on American-Muslim world relations, and how the image of both the Western and Muslim worlds were rapidly re-configured in the wake of the declaration of the War on Terror by the Bush administration in Washington. Elsewhere we have written about how the War on Terror had the adverse effect of rendering negative the image of the United States of America and the West in the eyes of Muslim communities in Asia (Noor, 2008, 2007, 2006, 2005¹). The same discourse that was taken up with some degree of enthusiasm by right-wing politicians in Western Europe also accounted for the resurgence of the far-right in countries like France, Denmark and Holland, and the deterioration of relations with Muslims resident there.² We have also looked at how the re-positioning of Muslim subjectivities and identities as a result of the oppositional dialectics between the West and Islam had contributed to some of the more awkward and bizarre configurations and re-configurations of floating signifiers (such as the signifier of Osama bin Laden himself) in a host of new contexts, ranging from dissident youth movements in China to anti-state forces in Southeast Asia (Noor, 2004³).

¹ Re: Farish A. Noor, Writings on the “War on Terror”, Global Media Publications, New Delhi, 2006; Farish A. Noor, Comment la “Guerre contre le Terrorisme” de Washington est devenue celle de tous: L’islamophobie et l’impact du 11 Septembre sur le terrain politique l’Asie du Sud et du Sud-est, in Ramon Grosfoguel, Mohamad Mestiri and El Yamine Soum, Islamophobie dans le Monde Moderne. IIT France and Berkeley University of California, Paris, 2008. (pp. 275–319); Farish A. Noor, How “Big Brother” America Became the “Great Satan”: Changing Perceptions of the United States among the Muslim Communities of Southeast Asia, in Ivan Krastev and Alan McPherson (Eds.), The Anti-American Century, Central European University (CEU) Press, Budapest and New York, 2007. (pp. 109–127); Farish A. Noor, “Uncle Sam to the Rescue? The Political Impact of American Involvement

Seen from the analytical perspective of discourse analysis, the War on Terror has had a significant impact in the reconfiguration of political/cultural identities and the forging of new political alliances between the Western world and the Muslim world. President Bush's simple gesture of drawing the dividing line between those "who are with us or against us" meant that henceforth the landscape of international politics would be divided between the "coalition of the willing" and the so-called "Axis of Evil", with no neutral space in between for fence-sitters. As we have argued elsewhere (Noor, 2007, 2006), this placed the governments of many Muslim-majority in ASEAN Security and Political Issues in the Wake of 9-11", in Denis Lacorne and Tony Judd (Eds.), With Us or Against Us: Studies in Global Anti-Americanism, Palgrave Macmillan, New York, 2005.

² By mid-2002, the countries of Western Europe had all experienced a major swing to the conservative right. In a series of general elections, the conservatives swept to power in France, the Netherlands, Denmark, Portugal and Italy. The rise of the far right in Europe coincided with the resurgence of the right in the United States, and the ideological discourses employed by them were very similar. In the wake of the attacks on the United States on 11 September 2001, the extreme right was in an even better position to take advantage of the fears and insecurities of the electorate. This led to the shocking and unpredicted win of the mercurial Front National candidate Jean-Marie Le Pen in the first round of the French Presidential election in early 2002. Though he lost in the second round, Le Pen and the Front National won nearly six million votes. In the Legislative Assembly election that followed, the conservative party of Jacques Chirac did much better than expected, and ended the five-year period of rule by the socialists led by Lionel Jospin. In the Netherlands, a major electoral upset was caused by the sudden rise of extreme-right candidate Pim Fortuyn, who burst on the local political scene with his uncompromising anti-immigration and anti-Muslim rhetoric, claiming Muslims were a threat to Europe and European identity. Calling on Muslims in the Netherlands to respect and abide by Dutch customs and the Christian identity of Europe, Fortuyn wrote and published a book entitled Against the Islamisation of the Netherlands. Though attacked by many leftists and liberals, Fortuyn gained wide support, particularly in the Rotterdam region. Less than nine days before the election, he was assassinated by a militant environmentalist who objected to his statements about animal rights. Fortuyn's party received a massive sympathy vote from the electorate, winning 36 per cent of the votes and 26 seats in Parliament. The party didn't even exist 80 days before the election.

³ Farish A. Noor, "When Osama and Friends Came a-calling: The Political Deployment of the Overdetermined Image of Osama ben Laden in the Contestation for Islamic Symbols in Malaysia", in Peter van der Veer and Shoma Munshi (Eds.), Media, War and Terrorism: Responses from the Middle East and Asia. Routledge Curzon, Politics in Asia series, London, 2004. (pp. 197–223).

countries in a difficult and uncomfortable position, having to choose between either placating the geo-strategic demands of Washington or bowing to pressure from their own Muslim electorates and constituencies.

What the War on Terror—as a discourse—did was to effectively narrow down the scope of logical possibilities for many non-Western countries and governments, and rendered any form of constructive dialogue with Islamist actors and agents beyond the horizon of possibility. It also set up two neat chains of equivalences: One which discursively equated the West with freedom, democracy and the “forces of good”; and the other that discursively equated Islam and the Muslim world with a host of real and imagined evils, ranging from terrorism to orchestrated violence against all proponents of democracy and freedom. It is interesting to note that as the latter chain of equivalences was expanded, it also managed to net other states that were deemed to be equally hostile to the values that were valorized by the Bush administration, including ostensibly secular and certainly not Muslim states like North Korea and Cuba: all of whom were lumped together as part of the international Axis of Evil.

The aim of this paper is not to look into the semantic and symbolic construction of identities or even to problematize the workings of such politically and ideologically-loaded vocabularies. Rather, we would like to look at one of the side-effects of such a process of drawing together a chain of equivalences, in terms of its impact on ordinary Muslims who were roped into taking sides in the War on Terror and who—as a result of a range of new security measures such as racial and religious profiling—unwittingly and unwillingly brought within its security ambit.

II. Racial/Religious Profiling as the Othering of Muslims: Its impact on West-Islam relations

We should emphasize at this point that violence in the name of religion in general and Islam, in particular, is neither new nor a surprise to anyone. Furthermore, intra-Muslim violence and violence between Muslims and others has been a historical fact long before the events of 11 September 2001. In this respect at least, it is important for us to understand how and why the attacks on the United States on 11 September were subsequently rendered unique and singular.

Fear and anxiety in the United States about Islam and Muslims is not a novel phenomenon: It made itself manifest in the nation-wide panic over Islam and Muslims in the wake of the Oklahoma bombing in the mid-1990s, even though it was subsequently proven that the bombing of the FBI building in Oklahoma city was not the work of Muslims but rather home-grown white supremacist ethno-nationalists like Timothy McVeigh. Nonetheless, the fact that in the space of 24 hours, allegations were cast against Muslims in the United States demonstrated the fact that anti-Muslim (or particularly anti-Arab) sentiment was rife in some quarters of the United States.

In the wake of 11 September 2001, however, a more complex discourse was assembled by Western security analysts to explain the event and to serve as a rationale and justification for the policy measures that were to follow. We have seen how scores of academics, analysts, policymakers and think-tanks have been working hard to locate the ideological cause and underpinnings of the attacks in Islam itself: monographs and books, theses and dissertations have been written trying to trace the source of Muslim anger not in the political economy of international relations or the uneven economic and power differentials between the West and the developing world, but rather in textual and historical sources and contexts instead. Over the past decade, a range of experts on “Islamic terrorism” have tried to locate the cause of terror in the writings of Muslim scholars like Ibn Taymiyya,⁴ the political and

⁴ The Hanbalite scholar Taqial-din ibn Taymiyya lived between the years 1263 and 1328. Living as he did at a time when the Muslim lands were under threat from Mongol and Christian invaders, ibn Taymiyya’s views on law, politics, society and relations with other non-Muslim communities reflected a deep sense of fear and insecurity. Fazlur Rahman (1979) has noted that “Ibn Taymiyya’s programme fundamentally consists of a restatement of the Shariah and a vindication of religious values. (For him) the Shariah was a comprehensive concept and it included the spiritual truth of the Sufis (haqiqa) and the rational truth (aql) of the philosopher and the theologian, and the law.” (p. 111) His aim was to reunify all these practices and disciplines under the higher register of the Shariah. Throughout his career, he engaged in numerous dialogues and disputations with both the Sufis and rationalist philosophers, as well as traditionalist Ulama. Ibn Taymiyya also criticized the practice of Taqlid—adherence to any one of the four major schools of Sunni Islamic legal thought—on the grounds that such divisions had no place in Islam and that they also led to confusion and divisions among the Muslim community. In all these cases, ibn Taymiyya’s underlying concern was the need to unite and protect Muslims from both internal and external threats and divisions. Much of his writings concentrated on the need for Muslims to defend themselves and their faith at whatever cost. He advocated the separation of Muslims from non-Muslims, and called on Muslims to withdraw from contact with others lest they be contaminated by their influence. This exclusive and defensive attitude led to a culture of paranoia and over-protectiveness among his followers and adherents, and ibn Taymiyya’s constant calls for the “purification” of Islam and Muslim practices contributed to the practice of takfir (accusing other Muslims of being kafirs) among his followers. Fazlur Rahman (1979) notes that ibn Taymiyya did not have a large following during his own lifetime and his influence did not lead to the creation of a specific movement. But in the centuries that followed, other Islamist groups from the Hanbalite tradition would take up his ideas and put them to work, the most notable ideological role of Wahabism, primordial attachments to the collective memory of the Crusades, and so on.

Yet, despite whatever angle was adopted, the root causes of Muslim anger was somehow located in Islam and Muslim religious and cultural norms and history, thus pathologizing it as a Muslim problem. Because the vocabulary of the discourse of the War on Terror framed the terms of the conflict thus, the neat bifurcation of the two dyadic categories of Islam and the West made it next to impossible for ordinary Muslims to stand outside the economy of differentiation and difference and to claim a sense of Muslim identity that was not somehow or another drawn into this dialectical conflict. If, as the unstated assumption went, the cause of Muslim anger and violence were to be found in the teachings, history and norms of Islam and Muslim life itself, it followed logically that every Muslim was a potential terrorist who could potentially hate the West and do violence to it and its values.

The net results of this rather simple form of opposition dialectics were manifold:

- Apart from giving support to those who had already held long-term anxiety and fear of Islam and umbrage to believing and practicing Muslims, it also meant that those Muslims who wished to retain their sense of Muslim identity and not be drawn into the violent oppositional dialectics of Islam versus the West had to constantly demonstrate their commitment to the values of democracy, liberty, freedom, etc. that had been claimed by others.
- This in turn opened up a range of opportunity structures for Muslims to choose whether they would conform to the role of “good Muslims” or “bad Muslims”, but on terms that were set by others and not of their own choosing. As we have seen in many of the highly contested debates and controversies that have arisen in the West of late, almost all the symbols and signifiers of Muslim being the Wahabbis of the Arabian Peninsula (p. 114). Many other conservative and radical Islamist movements like the Ahl-i Hadith, Ikhwan 'ul Muslimun and Jama'at-e Islami also trace this intellectual lineage back to him. [See: Fazlur Rahman, Islam. University of Chicago Press, Chicago. 1979 (2nd edition), Saodah Abdul Rahman, The Concept of Takfir (Accusing of Disbelief) Among Some Contemporary Islamic Movements with Special Reference to Egypt. Ph.d thesis, Department of Theology, University of Birmingham, Birmingham. May 1994.]

identity—from headscarves to the minarets of mosques—have now become politically and ideologically loaded symbols contested by both liberal and secular Westerners and Muslims, as well as conservative Muslims who wish to maintain some control over the symbols of their identity.

- And despite the attempts to demonstrate their commitment to the values of liberal-democracy and freedom, even those who were wont to be lumped into the category of “good Muslims” were kept in a probationary state where their identities and subject-positions would be and could be redefined and reconfigured at any time, by others who held them up against a benchmark of social acceptance not of their own design.

The racial/religious profiling of Muslims and their newfound status as probationary citizens in the world community that suspected their intentions meant that Muslim identity remained contested and problematic. The only ones who seemed to benefit from the situation were those who wished to perpetuate the instrumental fiction of Muslims being a potential source of violence and perpetually on the margins of social/political acceptability; and Islamist conservatives whose own oppositional dialectics against the West and all things Western equally necessitated the creation of such a violent and contested frontier between “Us” and “Them”.

Yet after almost a decade and despite the international effort to win the so-called War on Terror, little progress has been made in terms of improving relations and deepening the understanding between communities. We would argue that what we have witnessed thus far is a repetition of the old: namely a case where the racial/religious profiling of a particular community has done little to bring us any closer towards a politics of inclusion, but rather has moved us to a politics of exclusion which can only aggravate the situation further and open up other opportunity structures for resistance, opposition and violence. The example we wish to cite is closer to home, and refers to the Sepoy Munity in Singapore in the year 1915.

III. From loyal subject to mistrusted Other: The repositioning of Indian Muslims in Singapore after the 1915 Sepoy Mutiny and its impact on colonial race-relations “Racial and/or religious profiling” has become a buzzword of late, and has become a contentious issue for many public intellectuals, policymakers, security experts and human rights activists. However, it ought to be noted that racial and/or religious profiling is not exactly a new phenomenon either, and that it has in fact been practiced in many earlier historical contexts. One such context was the context of colonial race-relations as it was practiced during the height of Western colonial power in Asia, Africa and other parts of the world between the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, and as we hope to show in our example cited below, racial and/or religious profiling owes its history and genealogy to this period where race-relations were framed against a hierarchical relation of power-differentials that was part and parcel of the colonial enterprise in the first place.

Here it has to be noted that racial/ethnic profiling is hardly a new phenomenon, and that its genealogy can be traced back to the pseudo-scientific theories of racial difference that were the bedrock of colonial race-relations and racialized capitalism during the colonial era itself. We have argued elsewhere (Noor, 2009) that the concept of race and racial difference was introduced to the colonial setting of Singapore, Malaya and the rest of Southeast Asia as part and parcel of the colonizing apparatus, which was created in order to facilitate and expedite the exploitation of natural resources in the colonies through the help (labour) of racially differentiated colonial subjects. Thus it has to be remembered that as far back as the mid-nineteenth century, theories of generic racial/ethnic traits and essentialized typologies were already in currency in the discourse of governance in many of the colonies of Asia.⁵

The British Empire, which shall be our focus here, was a cosmopolitan and global empire that brought together communities of all kinds—differentiated along ethnic, cultural, linguistic and religious lines—into a singular global network of power and economic relations. Yet the cosmopolitanism of this imperial network was one that was also regulated according to an order of knowledge and power that situated some ethnicities/races above others, and which kept all colonized subjects on the lower rungs of the social ladder. The challenge of the imperial system was to secure and maintain the loyalty of the colonized subjects on the basis of contractual obligations and loyalties to an imperial mother-state, while relegating other loyalties and attachments (including primordial loyalties to ethnicity, homeland and religion) secondary. This posed problems (both existential and political) for those Asian and African colonial subjects who felt themselves torn between loyalty to the empire and their respective ethnic and religious identities. By the turn of the nineteenth century, colonial subjects across Asia were asking themselves the question: Can one be a loyal colonial subject and a Muslim/Hindu/Buddhist Indian/Malay/Burmese at the same time?

⁵ Re: Farish A. Noor, “The Lost Tribes of Malaysia: The Construction of “Race” and Racial Difference during the colonial era”, in Farish A Noor, Farish A. Noor: What Your Teacher Did Not Tell You: The Annexe Lectures, Volume I. Matahari Books, Kuala Lumpur, 2009.

With the onset of the First World War, the standing of Indian Muslims in British India and the other Asian colonies of Britain (as well as the significant presence of Indian Muslims in Britain, the United States of America and Western Europe) would once again be put to question. By then, the British colonial authorities in British India, Burma, Malaya and Singapore were deeply concerned about the rise of new Indian nationalist movements in India and abroad, and to compound their fears even further, the discovery of the Pan-Indian Ghadar conspiracy⁶ and the so-called “Hindu-German

⁶ The “Ghadar conspiracy” that was hatched in the United States of America was linked to the “Indian-German Conspiracy” of the same period, and both plans were linked to the nascent anti-colonial movement that began to emerge in India by the end of the nineteenth century. The rapid development of the colony meant that India was by then one of the biggest colonial markets in the Empire and a major source of natural resources as well. Britain’s fortunes in colonial India hung in the balance with the onset of the First World War. India was then the colony that provided most of the manpower in the war effort against Germany and her allies; and India alone sent out 1.3 million soldiers to help Britain in the Western front. However, by then, sentiments had begun to change in India as more and more Indian nationalist leaders and movements like the Indian Nationalist Congress (est. 1885) and Muslim League (est. 1906) were demanding the right for self-determination. Prior to the outbreak of the First World War, those in the Indian diaspora were already working hard to mobilize Indians abroad in the name of Indian self-determination and independence. Thanks to the missionary efforts of Hindu scholars like Vivekananda, the ideals and philosophy of Hinduism had found a receptive audience in the West. In 1908, the Irish lawyer-philanthropist Myron Phelps helped to found the India House of New York, in Manhattan. Prior to that, the Indian leader Shyamji Krishna Varma who had founded the India House in London had established contact with Irish republicans in London who were likewise sympathetic to the cause of the Indian nationalists, and over the years the relationship between Indian nationalists and Irish republicans on both sides of the Atlantic grew stronger and stronger. Following the creation of the India House in New York, Indian student activists began to circulate their own publications such as The Indian Sociologist and Free Hindustan that delved into the history of India and the historical destiny of the Indian people. Much of these activities received the support of Irish plot”⁷ only reinforced the paranoia of British colonial administrators that something had to be done fast to prevent India from falling into the hands of Indian nationalists republicans based in the United States, as well as American liberals and socialists who were opposed to imperialism and the British imperial presence in India in particular. In 1908, Indian leaders such as P. S. Khankhoje, Tarak Nakh Das and Kanshi Ram founded the Indian Independence League (IIL) in Portland, Oregon. These initial attempts to mobilize Indians in America against British colonial rule led to the formation of the Pacific Coast Hindoostan Association in 1913, which was led by Har Dayal and Sohan Singh Bhaka. Many of its initial members were Indian students like Tarak Nakh Das and Vishnu Ganesh Pingle, who were studying in the United States in universities such as Berkeley University in California. With the outbreak of the First World War, the Pacific Coast Hindoostan Association evolved to become the Ghadar party and its immediate goal was to entice Indian soldiers in the British colonial army to revolt against the British commanding officers. The Ghadar party founded its own newsletters and journals such as the Hindustan Ghadar, where the members of the movement called for open revolt against the British imperial government. Despite the attempts to suppress the movement in the United States (by the American government, at the request of their British counterparts), Ghadarite leaders were able to travel across America, Canada, Europe and Asia to spread their ideas: Between 1913 and 1914, one of the leaders of the Ghadar party, Mathra Singh, managed to travel from the United States to China (Shanghai) and then to India and Hong Kong to preach the ideas of the movement and to call on Indian colonial soldiers to rebel against the British. In 1914, the Ghadar movement put its plans into action and began to despatch Ghadar party activists back to India with the help of Irish republicans as well as the Germans (who were engaged against the British in the European theatre of war). Among the key Ghadarite leaders then involved in the operation were the Berkeley-educated Vishnu Ganesh Pingle, Rash Behari Bose, Kartar Singh and Sachin Sanyal. The members reached India through a myriad of routes that went across China, Central Asia as well as Thailand. By February 1915, the outline of the plan was set: The aim of the Ghadarites was to set off a series of bomb attacks across Bengal and Punjab with the hope that it would create a situation of conflict and anarchy that would allow the Indian colonial army units to break free and turn against their commanders. The Ghadari plot, however, was discovered by Kirpal Singh, a British-Indian soldier who was serving the CID (Criminal Investigations Department) of the British security services in Punjab. As a result, the planned attacks were brought forward but to no avail. British CID managed to stop most of the attacks in India, and the planned revolt of the 130th Baluchi Regiment in Rangoon was likewise thwarted. Among the few attacks that did succeed was the Indian Muslim revolt in Singapore. Following the discovery of the Ghadar conspiracy, the movement’s leaders were rounded up and put on trial under the Defence of India Act of 1915. V. G. Pingle was among those caught and arrested while carrying explosive devices. Under the Defence of India Act, extraordinary measures were introduced to further enhance and protect British rule in India; which in turn further soured relations between the British colonial government and the Indian nationalists even further. [Re: Giles Brown, The Hindu Conspiracy 1914–1917, University of California Press, 1948; B. R. Deepak, Revolutionary Activities of the Ghadar Party in China, Sage Publications, 1999; Peter Hopkirk, On Secret Service East of Constantinople, Oxford University Press, 2001; Tilak R. Sareen, Secret Documents of the Singapore Mutiny of 1915, Mouto Publishing House, New Delhi, 1995.]

⁷ The “Hindu-German conspiracy” was the result of two unrelated developments at the turn of the twentieth century: The emergence of Indian nationalism in India and the rise of Germany as a power with military ambitions in Europe. By then, London, Oxford and Cambridge were the centres of Indian nationalist thought and many young Indian activists were working among themselves as well as other anti-colonial and anti-imperialist movements that were operating openly in the imperial metropole. Among the first Indian leaders who arrived in London to organize the nationalist movement there was Shyamji Krishna Varma, who later helped to found the India House of London. Krishna Varma then also created the Indian Home Rule Society, which called on Indians in Britain to take an active part in the development of Indian nationalism. Among Varma’s close contacts in London was Mohammad Barkatullah, who later created the India House of New York, based in Manhattan in 1906. While Indians in America had created the Pacific Coast Hindustan Association—that was under the leadership of Indian nationalists like Har Dayal and Sohan Singh Bhakna—the Indians of Britain and the rest of Western Europe were likewise engaged in organizing themselves. India House in London became the focal point of anti-British and anti-colonial activities, and hosted the visit of radical Indian leaders like V. D. Sarvarkar (who would later become the leader of the Rashtriya Swayansevak Sangh), working hand-in-glove with the enemies of the British Empire, be it Germany or some pan-Islamic Muslim brotherhood.⁸

Due to the manner in which imperial expansion created networks of communication that brought disparate localities into closer proximity, events that were taking place until the assassination of Sir Curzon Wylie (then aide to the Secretary of State for India). Following the death of Sir Curzon Wylie, the activities of India House came under the control of the London Metropolitan Police and the Special Branch. Due to increased political pressure on them, many of the Indian nationalist activists chose to work underground or to move to other Western European countries that were more sympathetic to their nationalist cause. One of the countries that was openly supportive of the Indian nationalists then was Germany. Germany's Chancellor Theobald von Bethmann Hollweg and the German Intelligence Bureau for the East, which was headed by Max von Oppenheim, were open to the idea of Indian nationalists working in Berlin then. To that end, an office was prepared for the Indian nationalist leaders in Berlin and the Berlin-based "German committee" was set up under the leadership of C. R. Pillay and V. N. Chatterjee. Arthur Zimmermann, then head of the German Foreign Affairs committee was supportive of the Berlin committee group, and efforts were then made by the Germans to help the Indian nationalists in their plans to hasten the collapse of British colonial rule in India. In 1914–1917, the Berlin committee worked closely with other Indian nationalist activists and movements across Europe and the United States of America to do as much as they could to stall the British war effort, with German support. Plans were made to assassinate Lord Kitchener, who was then the Secretary of State for War, and Lord Grey, who was Foreign Secretary, but neither came to fruition. Muhammad Barkatullah was then based in Europe and left in charge with the procurement of explosive devices, most of which never reached their appointed destinations due to the co-ordinated efforts of British, French and Swiss intelligence agencies. The most elaborate plot of all involved the transport of more than 10,000 small arms (rifles) and four million rounds of ammunition from the United States to India via Batavia, Bangkok and Burma—but this plot was also uncovered in the end. The discovery of the arms plot led to the Hindu-German conspiracy trial, which lasted for several years and became the longest-running trial in American history then. The trial was set in the courthouse of San Francisco and ended almost a year later in April 1918. On the final day of the trial, the lead suspect among those accused, Ram Chandra, was shot by another suspect in the courtroom itself, leading to accusations of the trial being a "show trial" and a cover-up. During the trial process itself, American public opinion remained divided as there remained many quarters of American society that were sympathetic to the Indian nationalist cause and opposed to European imperialism in Asia. Germany's ambassador in the United States Count Johann von Bernstorff attempted to take possession of the weapons shipment, claiming that they were meant for Germany's colonial forces in the East African colonies, but without success. The failure to send the weapons to the Indian radical nationalists in India meant that the planned revolt of the Indian colonial army was not able to take place, and allowed Britain to maintain its hold on India for another three decades at least. As a result of the discoveries of the Hindu-German conspiracy, Britain's intelligence ties with the United States were to improve in the decades to come. Initially, American intelligence and security services were reluctant to openly restrict the activities of the Indian nationalists in their own territory, but following the Hindu-German conspiracy trial the intelligence agencies of both countries would work closer together. [Re: Harald Fischer-Tine, "Indian Nationalism and the World Forces: Transnational and Diasporic dimensions of the Indian Freedom Movement on the Eve of the First World War", in: Journal of Global History 2 , pp. 325–244, Cambridge, 2007; Karl Hoover, The Hindu Conspiracy in California, German Studies Review, German Studies Association, 1985; Joan M. Jensen, "The 'Hindu Conspiracy': A Reassessment", in The Pacific Historical Review Vol.48, No.1., University of California Press, 1979.]

⁸ During and after this period, Britain's Indian Political Intelligence Office, which was headed by John Wallinger, was allowed to expand and recruit more intelligence operatives. In order to check on the development of the Indian nationalist movement abroad, the Indian Intelligence office eventually expanded the scope of its activities all the way to Europe and Southeast Asia. One of the more prominent recruits to the service was the author Somerset Maugham, who was recruited in 1915 and asked to maintain his public role as a writer, which in turn allowed him to travel relatively freely across Europe and Asia then.

hundreds and thousands of miles away would have an impact on the Indian Muslims of Southeast Asia. While the British colonial authorities in India were worried about the impact that growing Indian nationalism in Europe and America might have on their own power in India, an event took place in Southeast Asia that demonstrated the extent to which the Indian Muslim diaspora was intimately connected with the wider Indian Muslim diaspora worldwide: The Mutiny of the 5th Light Infantry Sepoys in Singapore in February 1915.

Background to the 1915 Indian Muslim Mutiny in Singapore

At the turn of the twentieth century, life for the Indian Muslims of Singapore was relatively easy as the structure of the plural economic system that had been put into place allowed migrants from India, China and other parts of the world to set up their enterprises with little fanfare and to prosper as long as they abided by the laws of the Straits Settlements.

Yet the Sepoy Mutiny of 1915 was sparked by one Kassim Mansur, who was an Indian Muslim of Gujerati descent and who, in 1915, had set up his business in Singapore as one of the many Indian Muslim merchants there. Mansur, like many other Indian Muslims of his generation, had come to Singapore to start a new life as a merchant in the import-export business and had grown considerably wealthy thanks to the coffee-shop that he ran. Mansur's own status as colonial subject meant that he was subject to the laws of Britain and the Empire, though this did not alter the fact that as an Indian and a Muslim, he also owed his loyalties elsewhere as well.

At the outset of the First World War, many Indian Muslims in Singapore, British Malaya and British Burma would find themselves in a predicament similar to his, having to demonstrate their loyalties to the British crown while remaining Muslims by faith and Indians by ethnicity. However, prosperity alone offered little solace to Indian Muslims like Mansur when they realized that the outset of the First World War would pit the forces of the British Empire against the armies of Ottoman Turkey, long considered by Indian Muslims the world over as the final bulwark of Muslim power following the collapse of Moghul rule in India.

Even before the advent of the Khilafat movement⁹ in India, Indian Muslim in India and the other colonies of Britain were wary of the prospect of having to choose between the British Empire and the Ottoman Caliphate.

As soon as Ottoman Turkey threw its lot with the Germans and became a member of the Central Powers axis, it was clear that the Muslim subjects of the British Empire were expected to remain loyal to the Crown of England and turn against their fellow Muslim brothers instead. Keenly aware of the difficulty that would be posed by this moral dilemma faced by millions of Muslim colonial subjects the world over, Sultan Mehmet V of Turkey issued a fatwa calling on the Muslims of the world to unite and to support the Caliphate above all else. For the Indian Muslims who were then residing in the crown colonies of Britain, this proved to be a rallying call that was difficult to ignore as well as a dilemma that was impossible to resolve.

⁹ The Khilafat Movement began as a reaction among Muslims worldwide to the perceived threat that the Ottoman Caliphate was about to be dismantled in the wake of the First World War. Ottoman Turkey had sided with the Germans during the First World War, and was likewise defeated by the allied forces. The treaties of Versailles (1919) and Sevres (1920) proceeded to reduce the territory of the Ottoman Empire and led to the creation of a host of new independent Arab states that came under the protection of the British and the French, respectively. At the same time, a new generation of Turkish nationalists dubbed the “Young Turks” under the leadership of Mustafa Kemal Atatürk were equally bent on dismantling the Ottoman Caliphate in order to create the modern Republic of Turkey and to transfer the seat of political power to the Turkish national assembly. Consequently, Indian Muslim activist leaders like Maulana Mohammad Ali Jouhar began to call on India’s Muslims to rise up against the British for the latter’s role in the slow destruction of the Caliphate. Describing the British as infidel enemies of Islam who wished to destroy the last bastion of Muslim political power, Maulana Mohammad urged Muslims to come together to fight against British colonial rule and to support the Ottoman Sultan. Maulana Mohammad was supported by other Indian Muslim leaders like Maulana Shaukat Ali, Maulana Ahmed Ansari, Hazrat Mohani, Hakim Ajmal Khan and Maulana Abul Kalam Azad in setting up the All-India Khilafat Committee in Lucknow, Uttar Pradesh, in 1919. Cognisant of the power and influence of the Khilafat Committee, the Indian nationalist leaders of the Indian National Congress sought to work with them in a demonstration of Pan-Indian solidarity with their fellow Indian Muslims. In 1920, the Congress formally aligned itself with the Khilafat movement and the Khilafat movement’s cause was endorsed by Congress leaders like Mahatma Gandhi. Gandhi urged the Muslims of India to work with the Congress in the combined struggle to free India from colonial rule and to protect the Caliphate at the same time. In 1920–1921, thousands of Indian Muslims from the northern provinces of Sindh, Punjab and the North-West Frontier Province were asked to migrate—on foot—to Afghanistan by crossing the great Khyber Pass. More than 20,000 ordinary Indian Muslims, mostly from the poorer strata of Indian society, attempted the migration to Afghanistan, which they regarded as part of Dar’ul Islam. The great hijra proved to be one of the biggest humanitarian disasters of the Indian proto-nationalist struggle, for thousands of Muslims were attacked, robbed and killed by dacoits along the way; and were not welcomed by the Afghans who regarded them as interlopers. Notwithstanding this major disaster, the leaders of the Indian Khilafat movement continued in their work to propagate their cause worldwide. Working through the formal and informal networks of communication that connected the domains of the British Empire, delegations were sent by the Indian Khilafat Committee across India, and to Burma, Malaya, Singapore and beyond. It was the final defeat of the Ottoman Sultan and the declaration of the new secular Republic of Turkey by Kemal Atatürk in 1924 that eventually marked the end of the Khilafat project.

Faced with such an existential dilemma, Kassim Mansur sought the help and advice of Nur Alam Shah, one of the local imams in Singapore. Both men were of Indian origin and belonged to the Muslim faith; and both of them regarded their presence and role in the stratified plural economy of the colony as problematic. It was Nur Alam Shah who first raised the concern of the Ghadar movement in America and Europe, and who felt that the time had come for both of them to lend a hand in the pan-Indian campaign to liberate India from the clutches of the British. Between the two of them, the plan for the Sepoy Mutiny of 1915 was laid out.

Singapore was then a transit point for various military units that served the British Empire and its eastern dominions. Since the time of Raffles and Minto, Singapore had been the most important maritime base for Britain's seaborne military adventures in the East. It was from Singapore that the troops of the British colonial army were sent to take control of Java during the Napoleonic wars; it was from Singapore that British colonial troops were sent to defeat the forces of the Burmese kingdom during the first, second and third Anglo-Burmese wars; and it was from Singapore that British colonial troops were regularly sent out to quell disturbances in the Malay Peninsula, Hong Kong and as far as China.

As such, there were few permanent military units stationed in Singapore save for smaller units such as the Malay States Guides. When the First World War was declared, the most significant fighting unit based on the island was the Yorkshire Light Infantry, which was later seconded to the Western front in France to hold off the advancing forces of the German Kaiser. Fearful of leaving the island undefended, the 5th Indian Native Light Infantry battalion was called from Madras to plug the gap.

In October 1914, the Indian native unit finally arrived in Singapore where they had never been stationed before. None of the members of the Indian native force had any knowledge of Singapore, and were not acquainted with the social norms and cosmopolitan make-up of the island colony. By the time the 5th Light Infantry had settled in their barracks, however, the British colonial authorities had been warned of the "Ghadar conspiracy" that had been hatched by Indian nationalists in the United States of America, and how the Ghadarites intended to disrupt the British war effort by causing chaos in the colonies. (An earlier plot to get the soldiers of the 130th Baluchi Regiment to mutiny in Rangoon was discovered and foiled on 21 January 1915.) What the authorities in Singapore did not realize or expect was the possibility that the Indian troops in Singapore might be instigated to do the same by some of the Indian Muslims who were already settled on the island.

During the trial that came after the mutiny had been put down, it was revealed that Kassim Mansur and Nur Alam Shah had managed to gain access to the members of the 5th Light Infantry battalion, and invited their leaders to Mansur's home. In early February, the Indian soldiers were informed that they were about to be shipped to Hong Kong on the HMS Nile and stationed at the Hong Kong garrison. Many of the members of the battalion were, however, worried that they might be diverted to the Western front and forced to fight against the Turks instead. Mansur and Nur Alam Shah persuaded the members of the battalion to turn their guns against their commanding officers (who were all British) and to do their part in the global war against the kafirs, who were battling against their Muslim brothers defending the Caliphate in the West. Plans were laid out and the mutiny began on 15 February 1915, leading to the loss of 47 lives, the capture of the mutineers and the execution of the ring-leaders of the mutiny in May.¹⁰

¹⁰ The mutiny of the 5th Light Infantry Native Battalion took place around 3p.m. on 15 February 1915, when the members of the unit turned their guns against their commanding officers and occupied the barracks. Eight hundred and fifty members of the unit joined the mutiny, and were made up exclusively of Indian Muslims. Along with them were around a hundred members of the Malay States Guides who commanded their own mule battery, carrying light ordinance. The plan of the mutineers was to raid the barracks at Tanglin, seize weapons and then occupy parts of Singapore town. As the mutineers reached the barracks at Tanglin Hill, they discovered that 300 German soldiers had been kept there, after being taken prisoner from the German vessel SMS Emden. The German prisoners refused to join in the mutiny but were allowed to occupy the barracks. The mutineers then made their way to the docks where they proceeded to sabotage the works at Keppel harbour and Pasir Panjang. Along the way, they also attacked European civilians. The mutineers then laid siege to the residence of the commander of British forces in Singapore, Colonel E. Martin. Order was only restored when British marines from the HMS Cadmus were landed ashore and allowed to enter Singapore town to engage in street-to-street fighting with the mutineers. In the meantime, the commander of the British forces issued a general call for help, asking for the assistance of any allied vessels that were in the Malacca Straits at the time. In response, the French Cruiser Montcalm, the Russian Cruiser Aural and the Japanese battleships Otawa and Tsushima arrived 48 hours later (17 Feb) and landed their troops ashore to help support the British regain control of Singapore. The mutiny was finally crushed with the arrival of the 5th Shropshire Infantry Regiment from Rangoon, who managed to secure Singapore town and round up the remnants of the mutineers. Those mutineers who attempted to escape were later captured by the soldiers of the Sultan of Johore's army, across the Johore Strait. [Re: Sho Kuwajima, The First World War in Asia: the Indian Mutiny in Singapore. Osaka University, Osaka, 1988; Harry Miller and R. W. E. Harper, The Singapore Mutiny, Oxford University Press, Singapore, 1984.]

The Singapore Mutiny came as a blow to the British colonial authorities in Singapore as it signalled the loss of control over what was then regarded as one of their most precious colonies in the Far East. Cognisant of the strategic importance of the island as both a commercial centre as well as military base, the British authorities wasted little time before they meted out the sentences on those found guilty: Kassim Mansur and 47 other Indian Muslim mutineers were publicly executed by firing squad by the walls of Outram Prison, witnessed by 15,000 spectators.¹¹ Imam Nur Alam Shah was arrested, found guilty of hatching the plot and of being a member and supporter of the outlawed Ghadar movement. He was later detained and deported permanently from Singapore, never allowed to return again.

However, the real damage to British-Indian relations came later when, as a consequence of the mutiny and the sense of distrust that had developed among the British colonial authorities, new regulations were drawn up to register the entry and monitor the activities of all Indian colonial subjects in Singapore. By then, Britain's attitudes towards Indians in Singapore, British Malaya and British Burma had changed: Unlike the Chinese migrants and settlers who remained largely supportive (or indifferent) of the British war effort in Europe,¹² Indian settlers were subsequently regarded as a potential fifth column that could strike at the Empire from within.

Colonial race-relations suffered accordingly, and was further worsened by the new laws and regulations such as the Reserve Force Ordinance of 1915, which required compulsory military service from all colonial subjects between the ages of 15 to 55. Indian Muslims came under greater scrutiny and their activities—notably in publishing and the vernacular Indian press—were monitored constantly.

¹¹ Apart from the 47 mutineers who were shot at Outram Prison, many of the other members of the 5th Light Infantry battalion were also punished: 64 of them were transported for life and 73 of them imprisoned.

¹² There were no British colonial army units that were comprised of ethnic Chinese soldiers at the time in Singapore, or in any of the other colonies. However, the Chinese in the Straits Settlements of Singapore, Penang and Malacca were by and large supportive of the British war effort and demonstrated their loyalty to the Empire by contributing funds. The Chinese chambers of commerce in both Penang and Singapore collected donations from Chinese businessmen and entrepreneurs in order to purchase supplies for the British army. In Malaya and Singapore, the Chinese business community contributed enough funds to pay for 53 war planes for the British air force.

At the root of the fear and anxiety of the colonial administrators was the incompatibility of two warring logics: The homogenizing logic of Empire on the one hand, that necessarily reduced differences of culture, belief and origin to the horizontal register of a common colonial citizen-subjecthood; and the reality of governing an extended global empire where cultural differences and religious pluralism were the norms. The colonial administrators then could not reconcile the need to maintain such a large empire that necessarily called upon the services of native subjects with the reality that those native subjects would themselves be cosmopolitan individuals who had many different identities at the same time: The soldiers of the 5th Light Infantry battalion were typical colonial subjects in this respect: they were culturally Indian, Muslim in their beliefs, and contracted soldiers by profession. To the shock and horror of their British commanders, they demonstrated that primordial attachments to homeland and religion superseded their contractual bonds to their employer, the British colonial army. As a result of this revelation that was announced in rather bloody terms, the British colonial authorities and commanders of the colonial armed forces came to realize that ethnic and religious bonds could not be weakened despite years of military training and discipline, and that fellow-feeling could only be guaranteed among fellow Europeans.

Crucially, for the Indian Muslims of Singapore—and other migrants of Indian origin by extension—their loyalty to the British Empire and to Singapore as their new home was put into question. In the years to come, the colonial subjects of Indian origin would be expected to demonstrate their loyalty to the Empire and the British Crown time and again; and time and again, the limits of Empire and its hold on the subjectivities of its subjects would be put to the test.

In the intervening years of the 1920s and 1930s, the loyalty of the Chinese colonial subjects would also be put to question, due to their attachments to China and their support for the Chinese nationalist movement and the Chinese communist party, respectively.¹³ The vast repertoire of new rules and regulations that were introduced

¹³ While the Chinese in Singapore were largely neutral during and after the First World War, many of them grew politically involved with the rise of Chinese nationalism and the Chinese Communist Party in China. If the Indian Muslims were suspected of having transnational pan-Islamic loyalties, the Chinese would later be suspected of having trans-national Chinese nationalist and communist leanings instead: The roots of the Malayan Communist Party go back to the South Seas Communist Party to police, monitor and control the behaviour and activities of the colonial subjects in the wake of the 1915 mutiny demonstrated the weakening grip of Empire in Southeast Asia, which in turn only helped to fuel this Eurocentric apprehension even further: No longer deemed as loyal subjects who could be relied upon in time of need, the Indian subjects of the colonies—and the Indian Muslims in particular—would be watched, followed, spied on and treated as the mistrusted Other who had to be kept at bay.

Following the Singapore Mutiny, the British colonial administration in British Malaya was likewise wary of the role played by Indian Muslim migrants who were mainly engaged in trade as well as enlisted as members of the colonial defence forces. The next great challenge that had to be faced was the mobilization of Indian Muslims in British Malaya and Singapore that took off when the Khilafat movement was created at the end of the First World War. And even after the Khilafat movement had died its natural death following the collapse of the Ottoman Caliphate in 1924, the resentment of the Indian Muslim colonial subjects would remain and would be tapped by both the Japanese and Indian Nationalists at the outset of the Second World War: It was hardly a surprise then that so many Indian colonial subjects lent their weight to the Indian

(SSCP), which was formed in Singapore in 1928. Two years later, the Malayan Communist Party (MCP) was formed (illegally) in 1930. Despite the secrecy surrounding the event, Leng, (2000) has noted that the launch was witnessed by at least one important communist leader destined to play an important role in the communist struggle in Southeast Asia: Quyen Ai Quoc @ Ho Chi Minh (who stood as the Eastern representative of the COMINTERN). The MCP's ideology was summed up by its "eight great postulates" and "ten great guiding principles" taken from the Communist Party of China (Ibid., p. 68). The British colonial authorities were initially wary of the MCP and regarded them as a security threat to the Empire and its colonies. But during the Second World War, the British were forced to rely on the MCP for support in their struggle against the Japanese: MCP guerrillas who were trained by British army officers fought and worked alongside other forces such as Force 136 and the Malay militias. The MCP organized its own militia, the Malayan People's Anti-Japanese Army (MPAJA); and the 1st regiment of MPAJA was established at Serendah, Selangor on 1 February 1942. After the war, the British worked fast to regain control of their colony and to establish military rule across British Malaya. Negotiations for a ceasefire with the MCP/MPAJA broke down and in 1948 a state of Emergency was declared and the MCP was banned. As a result, the MCP and its MPAJA guerillas took to the jungles to wage a guerilla war against the British colonial government and its armed forces. The anti-Communist insurgency continued long after Malaysia and Singapore gained their independence and by the 1970s the MCP and its armed units were forced to retreat to the rural interior and finally found refuge along the border with Thailand. As the Cold War came to an end, the Malaysian government agreed to end the conflict as long as the former members of the MCP/MPAJA gave up their arms and returned to non-political civilian life. [Lim Cheng Leng, The Story of a Psy-Warrior: Tan Sri Dr. C. C. Too, Batu Caves: Interpress Printers, 2000; Kumar Ramakrishna, "The Making of a Malayan Propagandist: The Communists, the British and C. C. Too", JMBRAS, LXXIII(1), 2000); A. E. Percival, The War in Malaya, London: Eyre and Spottiswoode, 1949; Hua Wu Yin, Class and Communalism in Malaysia, London: Zeb Books, 1983.]

National Army¹⁴ (Azad Hind Fauj, INA), which turned against the British following the defeat of British forces in Asia. And of course it is not a coincidence that the INA was founded in the most cosmopolitan colonial entrepot in all of the Empire: Singapore.

IV. Lessons from the 1915 Singapore Mutiny: Racial and religious profiling and the self-defeating logic of oppositional dialectics

What were the lessons learnt from the 1915 Singapore Mutiny, and how and why is that singular event relevant to us today?

¹⁴ The Indian National Army (Azad Hind Fauj) was created in Singapore in 1942 under the leadership of Mohan Singh and with the assistance of the Japanese Army. In January 1943, the INA came under the leadership of the Indian nationalist leader Subhas Chandra Bose who declared the INA to be the military wing of the Provisional Government of Free India (Arzi Hukumat-e-Azad Hind). By then, the INA had around 40,000 members as the mainstay of the fighting force. Bose had been living in exile outside India after he left the Indian National Congress and was forced to flee India for fear of being detained by the British. Though the INA was never a potent military force, its symbolic power as a tool for Indian Nationalist propaganda was considerable. The most significant element of the INA was its lack of caste awareness and the fact that it united Indians on the basis of a common Indian identity and a commitment to Indian national liberation and self-determination. Muslims as well as Hindus were found in the army and the INA's leadership comprised of Hindu and Muslim Indians from all stations of Indian social life. Significantly, the INA also helped to generate an awareness of a common Indian identity among the Indian diaspora in Southeast Asia, and heightened their sense of commitment towards India as their home country. The INA itself was not well-armed: Only 16,000 small arms were issued to the INA and many of the battalions were equipped with stock taken from the British army units that had surrendered. The INA lacked heavy ordinance and was given mortars at best, along with Bren guns and Vickers Machine-guns as well as British-issued hand grenades. Between 1944 and 1945, the INA was sent to take part in the Burma campaign alongside Japanese forces. The INA units conducted guerrilla warfare and were meant to infiltrate into India and to work among local communities to cause unrest and fan anti-British sentiments. By the end of the war, the INA was forced to retreat back to Thailand and then to Singapore. Most of the INA units had to be disbanded and re-amalgamated to form new units as supplies decreased. Subhas Chandra Bose left for Manchuria in September 1945, but was reported to be killed when his plane crashed. By the end of the war, the returning British and allied forces rounded up the remnants of the INA and had them shipped back to India via Chittagong and Calcutta to stand for trial. The surviving leaders of the INA would later enter Indian social and political life: Major General Shah Nawaz Khan was elevated to the post of Minister for Railways; Lakshmi Shantal later joined the Indian Communist Party and Ram Singh Thakur who had composed the INA's anthem later composed the Indian national anthem as well. Significantly, the members and leaders of the INA in the other British colonies of Southeast Asia also rose to positions of prominence in their respective societies: When the Malayan Indian Congress (MIC) was formed under the leadership of John Thivy, many of its founder-leaders were themselves former members of the INA—such as Janaky Athinappan, who was the second-in-command of the Rani of Jhansi Regiment. She later rose to the position of Senator in the Malaysian government. Another member of the Rani of Jhansi Regiment, Rassamah Bhupalan rose to become one of the first women's rights activists of Malaysia and a welfare-activist. [Re: Lebra, Joyce C., Jungle Alliance, Japan and the Indian National Army; and Japanese-Trained Armies in Southeast Asia, Hong Kong: Heinemann, 1977; Sugata Bose, A Hundred Horizons: The Indian Ocean During the Age of Empire, Harvard University Press, 2006; K. K. Ghosh, The Indian National Army: The Second Front in the Indian Nationalist Movement, Meenakshi Prakashan, Meerut, 1969; Hukam Chand, A History of Modern India, Anmol Press, Delhi, 2005; Peter Fay, The Forgotten Army: India's Struggle for Independence, Ann Arbor, University of Michigan Press, 1993.]

In the immediate context of the mutiny and the events that followed, the Singapore Mutiny of 1915 showed in the clearest terms that it was no longer possible for the British colonial authorities to expect and demand loyalty from their colonial subjects. Needless to say, it was impossible for the soldiers of the 5th Light Infantry battalion to feel loyal to Singapore, or to even harbour any notion of Singaporean identity as they were themselves itinerant soldiers who were expected to move wherever and whenever they were ordered to. (And they had just landed in Singapore a few months before the mutiny themselves.)

As we have argued above, the most serious implications of the mutiny were felt by the colonial subjects of Indian ethnicity and origin in Singapore as well as British Burma and Malaya then: For what the mutiny demonstrated in no uncertain terms was the fact that despite the outreach of the British Empire, it was impossible for the imperial authorities to force the colonial subjects to give up their cosmopolitan and multifarious attachments to ethnicity, language, religion and homeland. The Empire was indeed global and cosmopolitan, but even the panoptic vision of the Empire could not render secondary the residual attachments to primordial loyalties of ethnicity and faith; and even the Empire could not prevent the persistence of vertical cleavages of ethnic and religious identity and belonging among its subjects.

The second lesson to be drawn is the deleterious effects of racial, ethnic and religious stereotyping and profiling, which came in the wake of the Singapore Mutiny, for it turned out that by relegating the Indian colonial subjects to the negative category of suspected Others, they were in fact marginalized even further, adding to their sense of alienation. The narrative of Imperial dominion attempted to disguise the realities of the uneven power-relations between colonizers and the colonized, but the myth of Imperial cosmopolitanism was laid bare as a result of the new laws and regulations that were introduced to police, monitor and control the behaviour of the Indian colonial subjects across the Empire.

What the 1915 mutiny did was expose the deeper levels of resentment and frustration among Indian Muslim colonial subjects who did not buy into the myth of an imperial family of nations living in harmony with each other. In the inter-war years of the 20s and 30s, the memory of the Sepoy Mutiny of 1915 (and the punishment meted out to the mutineers afterwards) was kept alive by Indian proto-nationalists who later lent their support to the Japanese occupation army and the Indian National Army in Singapore. The singular event of the 1915 mutiny therefore exposed the weaknesses and contradictions of an imperial socio-economic-political order that was kept together by force and the threat of violence, and made it obvious that the imperial family of nations was a loose instrumental assembly of peoples, divided between the colonized and the colonizers.

For the sake of our immediate concerns today, we can see that such strategies of ethnic and religious profiling have done little to assuage the concerns of Muslims worldwide, who likewise feel that their membership with/to the international fraternity of nations is probationary.

This is perhaps one of the most damaging consequences of the War on Terror discourse: By framing Terrorism as being somehow connected to Islam and Muslim religious and social normativity, it has created a chain of equivalences that equates Islam with all that is wrong and/or antithetical to the West, while leaving both categories (the “West” and “Islam”) uninterrogated and essentialized. Such simple reductionism may seem to be part and parcel of any form of dialectics, but in the case of this particular discourse the narrative of the War on Terror has been staged out in the arena of international politics with very real political and geo-strategic consequences, not to mention the enormous human costs involved.

Suspicion of Islam and Muslim normativity strikes at the heart of Muslim identity itself, and the oppositional dialectics of the War on Terror that has forced Muslim nations and governments to take sides has meant that Muslim identity itself has become problematized—though not by Muslims. This has fuelled resentment and anger among Muslims worldwide and in the long run we can all see where this will lead us to: As long as the identity of Muslims is deemed problematic, then Muslims—who choose to be Muslims and who will not and cannot abandon their Muslim identity—will be faced with the false choice of conforming to some Western standard of acceptable behaviour or to defend their religious identity on their own terms. This has benefited only those who wish to perpetuate the logic of the War on Terror—notably the proponents of the War on Terror themselves and their *Jihadist*¹⁵ adversaries—but it has done little to add to genuine dialogue and an acceptance of difference as a reality of the cosmopolitan world we live in.

At the heart of the problem is the logic of oppositional dialectics itself, and the manner in which such modes of dyadic antagonism leads to adversarialism and conflict. This poses a more difficult and complex question that is perhaps beyond the scope of this paper. Can we ever think of a mode of identity politics that does not rest on dialectics, and a dialectics of opposition in particular? Granted that any sense of identity requires some sense difference and mode of differentiation, can we nonetheless think of a mode of differentiation that does not lead us to the negative stereotyping of the Other as the constitutive Other to ourselves?

Perhaps one way out of this problem is to accept the fact that while identities are discursively constructed, they need not be couched solely or primarily in oppositional terms against the Other; and to insist instead on the fact that identities are never essentialized but rather composite and complex—in short, cosmopolitan.

As we have seen in the case of the Sepoy Mutiny of 1915, the status and identity of Indian Muslim colonial subjects were put to the test when Indian Muslim soldiers were expected to retain their loyalty to the Empire at the expense of other loyalties (religious and ethnic) that they held equally dear and crucial to their sense of Selfhood. To accept that citizen-subjects can (and indeed do) have multiple identities that overlap and contest one another may be a more realistic way to imagine any sense of political belonging in diverse and complex societies, where a plethora of subject-citizens will have to learn to live with one another despite the internally-complex constitution of their private selves. This was clearly beyond the pale of acceptability

¹⁵ Again, we need to re-state the obvious fact that the War on Terror discourse finds its mirror counterpart in the equally reductionist and essentialist discourse of many violent and exclusive religio-political groups as well. If the discourse on the War on Terror has created a chain of equivalences that equates Islam with violence and terrorism, then a similar observation can be made about the exclusive religio-political discourse of Jihadi groups that combined both a Utopian vision of an Islamic future with a blanket denial and denunciation of the West and all things Western, forming its own chain of equivalences where the “West” (understood in the most general abstract manner) is equated with all that is un-Islamic, immoral, decadent, violent, oppressive and corrupt. Seen from the point of view of the Wittgensteinian notion of discourses as language-games, it can be argued that the discourse of the War on Terror and the discourse of Islamic Jihadism are two separate language games that do not actually engage in any meaningful dialogue with each other.

during the height of colonial power, where loyalty to the Empire was the prerequisite to membership of the imperial community of nations.

However, in the context of today's globalized world where communities reside and overlap with one another in such close proximity, such a nuanced sense of identity and belonging may be the way to ensure that we do not return to the path of oppositional identity politics and its attendant strategies of policing, surveillance and state violence. All over the world, the debate over identity-politics and the future of multicultural cosmopolitan societies is being heatedly conducted. In the West, fear and anxiety over the imagined "Islamization" of Western Europe has led to moral panic and the call for Europe to re-assert its identity, albeit couched in terms that deny the constructiveness and contingency of European history itself. The protests against the wearing of the Hijab, the construction of mosques in countries like France, Holland, Denmark and Switzerland, all point to the fear that the constitutive Other is now within. In Muslim societies, on the other hand, similar concerns have been raised about "Westernization" and its attendant contagions: secularism, materialism, feminism, democratization, etc.

The sharpening of boundaries (political, territorial as well as epistemic) between the West and the Muslim worlds has been one of the side-effects of the War on Terror and its polarizing logic. At the root of the problem is the inability and unwillingness to accept the contingent, complex and composite nature of our identities that are—necessarily—diachronic and historically as well as socially contextualized. The challenge that this poses for all societies and states today is having to accept and live with the cosmopolitanism that is the symptom of modern life in a globalized world, and to perhaps realize that while states and societies do have a levelling effect on individual subject-citizens, they cannot erase the multitude of other competing loyalties that individuals may have and live by. So far such an attempt at a critical understanding of identity politics has been left to the academic domain and has not been translated to political praxis.

Left as we are with the modern nation-state, we need to ask if the state can govern over complex plural societies where cosmopolitanism has become, and will remain, a defining feature of subjectivity and citizenship. In the European Union as it is in ASEAN today, states are still grappling with the challenge of how to accommodate plural subject-positions and identities while trying to keep the fabric of society and the public domain intact. Learning to live with and adapt to the religio-cultural attachments and loyalties of subject-citizens will have to be one of the priorities of states today, like it or not: for such loyalties—as we have seen from past and recent case-studies—are not about to disappear anytime soon.

Historical examples and case studies such as the 1915 Singapore Sepoy Mutiny may be instructive in helping us understand the dynamics of oppositional dialectics and the effects of the politics of othering, but they cannot—and seldom do—persuade those with invested interests to interrogate their own settled assumptions, change tack and alter the trajectory of their policies. History may instruct, but it cannot compel: There lies its strength but also its weakness.

Bibliography

- Giles Brown, The Hindu Conspiracy 1914-1917. University of California Press, 1948.
- B. R. Deepak, Revolutionary Activities of the Ghadar Party in China. Sage Publications, 1999.
- Harald Fischer-Tine, "Indian Nationalism and the World Forces: Transnational and Diasporic dimensions of the Indian Freedom Movement on the Eve of the First World War", in Journal of Global History 2, pp. 325–244. Cambridge, 2007.
- K. K. Ghosh, The Indian National Army: The Second Front in the Indian Nationalist Movement. Meenakshi Prakashan. Meerut, 1969.
- Karl Hoover, "The Hindu Conspiracy in California", German Studies Review. German Studies Association, 1985.
- Peter Hopkirk, On Secret Service East of Constantinople. Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Joan M. Jensen, "The 'Hindu Conspiracy': A Reassessment", in The Pacific Historical Review, Vol. 48, No. 1. University of California Press, 1979.
- Sho Kuwajima, The First World War in Asia: the Indian Mutiny in Singapore. Osaka: Osaka University, 1988.
- Joyce C. Lebra, Jungle Alliance, Japan and the Indian National Army; and Japanese-Trained Armies in Southeast Asia. Hong Kong: Heinemann, 1977.
- Lim Cheng Leng, The Story of a Psy-Warrior: Tan Sri Dr. C. C. Too. Batu Caves: Interpress Printers, 2000.
- Harry Miller and R. W. E. Harper, The Singapore Mutiny. Oxford University Press, Singapore, 1984.
- Farish A. Noor, "The Lost Tribes of Malaysia: The Construction of 'Race' and Racial Difference during the colonial era", in Farish A Noor, Farish A. Noor, What Your Teacher Did Not Tell You: The Annexe Lectures, Volume I. Kuala Lumpur: Matahari Books, 2009.
- Farish A. Noor, "Comment la "Guerre contre le Terrorisme" de Washington est devenue celle de tous: L'islamophobie et l'impact du 11 Septembre sur le terrain politique l'Asie du Sud et du Sud-est", in Ramon Grosfoguel, Mohamad Mestiri and El Yamine Soum, Islamophobie dans le Monde Moderne (pp. 275–319). Paris: IIIT France and Berkeley University of California, 2008.
- Farish A. Noor, "How 'Big Brother' America Became the 'Great Satan': Changing Perceptions of the United States among the Muslim Communities of Southeast

- Asia”, in Ivan Krastev and Alan McPherson (Eds.), The Anti-American Century (pp. 109-127). Budapest and New York: Central European University (CEU) Press, 2007.
- Farish A. Noor, Writings on the “War on Terror”. New Delhi: Global Media Publications, 2006.
- Farish A. Noor, “Uncle Sam to the Rescue? The Political Impact of American Involvement in ASEAN Security and Political Issues in the Wake of 9-11”, in Denis Lacorne and Tony Judt (Eds.), With Us or Against Us: Studies in Global Anti-Americanism. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2005.
- Farish A. Noor, “When Osama and Friends Came a-calling: The Political Deployment of the Overdetermined Image of Osama ben Laden in the Contestation for Islamic Symbols in Malaysia”, in Peter van der Veer and Shoma Munshi (Eds.), Media, War and Terrorism: Responses from the Middle East and Asia (pp. 197-223). London: RoutledgeCurzon, Politics in Asia series, 2004.
- Peter Fay, The Forgotten Army: India’s Struggle for Independence. Ann Arbor, University of Michigan Press, 1993.
- Fazlur Rahman, Islam (2nd edition). Chicago: University of Chicago Press. 1979.
- Saadah Abdul Rahman, “The Concept of Takfir (Accusing of Disbelief) Among Some Contemporary Islamic Movements with Special Reference to Egypt”. Ph.D. thesis, Department of Theology, University of Birmingham, Birmingham. May 1994.
- Kumar Ramakrishna, “The Making of a Malayan Propagandist: The Communists, the British and C. C. Too”, JMBRAS, LXXIII(1), 2000.
- Tilak R. Sareen, Secret Documents of the Singapore Mutiny of 1915. New Delhi: Mouto Publishing House, 1995.
- Hua Wu Yin, Class and Communalism in Malaysia. London: Zeb Books, 1983.

RSIS Working Paper Series

1. Vietnam-China Relations Since The End of The Cold War (1998)
Ang Cheng Guan
2. Multilateral Security Cooperation in the Asia-Pacific Region: Prospects and Possibilities (1999)
Desmond Ball
3. Reordering Asia: “Cooperative Security” or Concert of Powers? (1999)
Amitav Acharya
4. The South China Sea Dispute re-visited (1999)
Ang Cheng Guan
5. Continuity and Change In Malaysian Politics: Assessing the Buildup to the 1999-2000 General Elections (1999)
Joseph Liow Chin Yong
6. ‘Humanitarian Intervention in Kosovo’ as Justified, Executed and Mediated by NATO: Strategic Lessons for Singapore (2000)
Kumar Ramakrishna
7. Taiwan’s Future: Mongolia or Tibet? (2001)
Wen-peng (C.P.) Chung
8. Asia-Pacific Diplomacies: Reading Discontinuity in Late-Modern Diplomatic Practice (2001)
Tan See Seng
9. Framing “South Asia”: Whose Imagined Region? (2001)
Sinderpal Singh
10. Explaining Indonesia's Relations with Singapore During the New Order Period: The Case of Regime Maintenance and Foreign Policy (2001)
Terence Lee Chek Liang
11. Human Security: Discourse, Statecraft, Emancipation (2001)
Tan See Seng
12. Globalization and its Implications for Southeast Asian Security: A Vietnamese Perspective (2001)
Nguyen Phuong Binh
13. Framework for Autonomy in Southeast Asia’s Plural Societies (2001)
Miriam Coronel Ferrer
14. Burma: Protracted Conflict, Governance and Non-Traditional Security Issues (2001)
Ananda Rajah
15. Natural Resources Management and Environmental Security in Southeast Asia: Case Study of Clean Water Supplies in Singapore (2001)
Kog Yue Choong
16. Crisis and Transformation: ASEAN in the New Era (2001)
Etel Solingen
17. Human Security: East Versus West? (2001)
Amitav Acharya
18. Asian Developing Countries and the Next Round of WTO Negotiations (2001)
Barry Desker

19. Multilateralism, Neo-liberalism and Security in Asia: The Role of the Asia Pacific Economic Co-operation Forum (2001)
Ian Taylor
20. Humanitarian Intervention and Peacekeeping as Issues for Asia-Pacific Security (2001)
Derek McDougall
21. Comprehensive Security: The South Asian Case (2002)
S.D. Muni
22. The Evolution of China's Maritime Combat Doctrines and Models: 1949-2001 (2002)
You Ji
23. The Concept of Security Before and After September 11 (2002)
 - a. The Contested Concept of Security
Steve Smith
 - b. Security and Security Studies After September 11: Some Preliminary Reflections
Amitav Acharya
24. Democratisation In South Korea And Taiwan: The Effect Of Social Division On Inter-Korean and Cross-Strait Relations (2002)
Chien-peng (C.P.) Chung
25. Understanding Financial Globalisation (2002)
Andrew Walter
26. 911, American Praetorian Unilateralism and the Impact on State-Society Relations in Southeast Asia (2002)
Kumar Ramakrishna
27. Great Power Politics in Contemporary East Asia: Negotiating Multipolarity or Hegemony? (2002)
Tan See Seng
28. What Fear Hath Wrought: Missile Hysteria and The Writing of "America" (2002)
Tan See Seng
29. International Responses to Terrorism: The Limits and Possibilities of Legal Control of Terrorism by Regional Arrangement with Particular Reference to ASEAN (2002)
Ong Yen Nee
30. Reconceptualizing the PLA Navy in Post – Mao China: Functions, Warfare, Arms, and Organization (2002)
Nan Li
31. Attempting Developmental Regionalism Through AFTA: The Domestic Politics – Domestic Capital Nexus (2002)
Helen E S Nesadurai
32. 11 September and China: Opportunities, Challenges, and Warfighting (2002)
Nan Li
33. Islam and Society in Southeast Asia after September 11 (2002)
Barry Desker
34. Hegemonic Constraints: The Implications of September 11 For American Power (2002)
Evelyn Goh
35. Not Yet All Aboard...But Already All At Sea Over Container Security Initiative (2002)
Irvin Lim

36. Financial Liberalization and Prudential Regulation in East Asia: Still Perverse? (2002)
Andrew Walter
37. Indonesia and The Washington Consensus (2002)
Premjith Sadasivan
38. The Political Economy of FDI Location: Why Don't Political Checks and Balances and Treaty Constraints Matter? (2002)
Andrew Walter
39. The Securitization of Transnational Crime in ASEAN (2002)
Ralf Emmers
40. Liquidity Support and The Financial Crisis: The Indonesian Experience (2002)
J Soedradjad Djiwandono
41. A UK Perspective on Defence Equipment Acquisition (2003)
David Kirkpatrick
42. Regionalisation of Peace in Asia: Experiences and Prospects of ASEAN, ARF and UN Partnership (2003)
Mely C. Anthony
43. The WTO In 2003: Structural Shifts, State-Of-Play And Prospects For The Doha Round (2003)
Razeen Sally
44. Seeking Security In The Dragon's Shadow: China and Southeast Asia In The Emerging Asian Order (2003)
Amitav Acharya
45. Deconstructing Political Islam In Malaysia: UMNO'S Response To PAS' Religio-Political Dialectic (2003)
Joseph Liow
46. The War On Terror And The Future of Indonesian Democracy (2003)
Tatik S. Hafidz
47. Examining The Role of Foreign Assistance in Security Sector Reforms: The Indonesian Case (2003)
Eduardo Lachica
48. Sovereignty and The Politics of Identity in International Relations (2003)
Adrian Kuah
49. Deconstructing Jihad; Southeast Asia Contexts (2003)
Patricia Martinez
50. The Correlates of Nationalism in Beijing Public Opinion (2003)
Alastair Iain Johnston
51. In Search of Suitable Positions' in the Asia Pacific: Negotiating the US-China Relationship and Regional Security (2003)
Evelyn Goh
52. American Unilateralism, Foreign Economic Policy and the 'Securitisation' of Globalisation (2003)
Richard Higgott

53. Fireball on the Water: Naval Force Protection-Projection, Coast Guarding, Customs Border Security & Multilateral Cooperation in Rolling Back the Global Waves of Terror from the Sea (2003)
Irvin Lim
54. Revisiting Responses To Power Preponderance: Going Beyond The Balancing-Bandwagoning Dichotomy (2003)
Chong Ja Ian
55. Pre-emption and Prevention: An Ethical and Legal Critique of the Bush Doctrine and Anticipatory Use of Force In Defence of the State (2003)
Malcolm Brailey
56. The Indo-Chinese Enlargement of ASEAN: Implications for Regional Economic Integration (2003)
Helen E S Nesadurai
57. The Advent of a New Way of War: Theory and Practice of Effects Based Operation (2003)
Joshua Ho
58. Critical Mass: Weighing in on Force Transformation & Speed Kills Post-Operation Iraqi Freedom (2004)
Irvin Lim
59. Force Modernisation Trends in Southeast Asia (2004)
Andrew Tan
60. Testing Alternative Responses to Power Preponderance: Buffering, Binding, Bonding and Beleaguering in the Real World (2004)
Chong Ja Ian
61. Outlook on the Indonesian Parliamentary Election 2004 (2004)
Irman G. Lanti
62. Globalization and Non-Traditional Security Issues: A Study of Human and Drug Trafficking in East Asia (2004)
Ralf Emmers
63. Outlook for Malaysia's 11th General Election (2004)
Joseph Liow
64. Not Many Jobs Take a Whole Army: Special Operations Forces and The Revolution in Military Affairs. (2004)
Malcolm Brailey
65. Technological Globalisation and Regional Security in East Asia (2004)
J.D. Kenneth Boutin
66. UAVs/UCAVS – Missions, Challenges, and Strategic Implications for Small and Medium Powers (2004)
Manjeet Singh Pardesi
67. Singapore's Reaction to Rising China: Deep Engagement and Strategic Adjustment (2004)
Evelyn Goh
68. The Shifting Of Maritime Power And The Implications For Maritime Security In East Asia (2004)
Joshua Ho

69. China In The Mekong River Basin: The Regional Security Implications of Resource Development On The Lancang Jiang (2004)
Evelyn Goh
70. Examining the Defence Industrialization-Economic Growth Relationship: The Case of Singapore (2004)
Adrian Kuah and Bernard Loo
71. "Constructing" The Jemaah Islamiyah Terrorist: A Preliminary Inquiry (2004)
Kumar Ramakrishna
72. Malaysia and The United States: Rejecting Dominance, Embracing Engagement (2004)
Helen E S Nesadurai
73. The Indonesian Military as a Professional Organization: Criteria and Ramifications for Reform (2005)
John Bradford
74. Martime Terrorism in Southeast Asia: A Risk Assessment (2005)
Catherine Zara Raymond
75. Southeast Asian Maritime Security In The Age Of Terror: Threats, Opportunity, And Charting The Course Forward (2005)
John Bradford
76. Deducing India's Grand Strategy of Regional Hegemony from Historical and Conceptual Perspectives (2005)
Manjeet Singh Pardesi
77. Towards Better Peace Processes: A Comparative Study of Attempts to Broker Peace with MRLF and GAM (2005)
S P Harish
78. Multilateralism, Sovereignty and Normative Change in World Politics (2005)
Amitav Acharya
79. The State and Religious Institutions in Muslim Societies (2005)
Riaz Hassan
80. On Being Religious: Patterns of Religious Commitment in Muslim Societies (2005)
Riaz Hassan
81. The Security of Regional Sea Lanes (2005)
Joshua Ho
82. Civil-Military Relationship and Reform in the Defence Industry (2005)
Arthur S Ding
83. How Bargaining Alters Outcomes: Bilateral Trade Negotiations and Bargaining Strategies (2005)
Deborah Elms
84. Great Powers and Southeast Asian Regional Security Strategies: Omni-enmeshment, Balancing and Hierarchical Order (2005)
Evelyn Goh
85. Global Jihad, Sectarianism and The Madrassahs in Pakistan (2005)
Ali Riaz
86. Autobiography, Politics and Ideology in Sayyid Qutb's Reading of the Qur'an (2005)
Umej Bhatia

87. Maritime Disputes in the South China Sea: Strategic and Diplomatic Status Quo (2005)
Ralf Emmers
88. China's Political Commissars and Commanders: Trends & Dynamics (2005)
Srikanth Kondapalli
89. Piracy in Southeast Asia New Trends, Issues and Responses (2005)
Catherine Zara Raymond
90. Geopolitics, Grand Strategy and the Bush Doctrine (2005)
Simon Dalby
91. Local Elections and Democracy in Indonesia: The Case of the Riau Archipelago (2005)
Nankyung Choi
92. The Impact of RMA on Conventional Deterrence: A Theoretical Analysis (2005)
Manjeet Singh Pardesi
93. Africa and the Challenge of Globalisation (2005)
Jeffrey Herbst
94. The East Asian Experience: The Poverty of 'Picking Winners' (2005)
Barry Desker and Deborah Elms
95. Bandung And The Political Economy Of North-South Relations: Sowing The Seeds For Revisioning International Society (2005)
Helen E S Nesadurai
96. Re-conceptualising the Military-Industrial Complex: A General Systems Theory Approach (2005)
Adrian Kuah
97. Food Security and the Threat From Within: Rice Policy Reforms in the Philippines (2006)
Bruce Tolentino
98. Non-Traditional Security Issues: Securitisation of Transnational Crime in Asia (2006)
James Laki
99. Securitizing/Desecuritizing the Filipinos' 'Outward Migration Issue' in the Philippines' Relations with Other Asian Governments (2006)
José N. Franco, Jr.
100. Securitization Of Illegal Migration of Bangladeshis To India (2006)
Josy Joseph
101. Environmental Management and Conflict in Southeast Asia – Land Reclamation and its Political Impact (2006)
Kog Yue-Choong
102. Securitizing border-crossing: The case of marginalized stateless minorities in the Thai-Burma Borderlands (2006)
Mika Toyota
103. The Incidence of Corruption in India: Is the Neglect of Governance Endangering Human Security in South Asia? (2006)
Shabnam Mallick and Rajarshi Sen
104. The LTTE's Online Network and its Implications for Regional Security (2006)
Shyam Tekwani

105. The Korean War June-October 1950: Inchon and Stalin In The “Trigger Vs Justification” Debate (2006)
Tan Kwoh Jack
106. International Regime Building in Southeast Asia: ASEAN Cooperation against the Illicit Trafficking and Abuse of Drugs (2006)
Ralf Emmers
107. Changing Conflict Identities: The case of the Southern Thailand Discord (2006)
S P Harish
108. Myanmar and the Argument for Engagement: A Clash of Contending Moralities? (2006)
Christopher B Roberts
109. TEMPORAL DOMINANCE (2006)
Military Transformation and the Time Dimension of Strategy
Edwin Seah
110. Globalization and Military-Industrial Transformation in South Asia: An Historical Perspective (2006)
Emrys Chew
111. UNCLOS and its Limitations as the Foundation for a Regional Maritime Security Regime (2006)
Sam Bateman
112. Freedom and Control Networks in Military Environments (2006)
Paul T Mitchell
113. Rewriting Indonesian History The Future in Indonesia’s Past (2006)
Kwa Chong Guan
114. Twelver Shi’ite Islam: Conceptual and Practical Aspects (2006)
Christoph Marcinkowski
115. Islam, State and Modernity : Muslim Political Discourse in Late 19th and Early 20th century India (2006)
Iqbal Singh Sevea
116. ‘Voice of the Malayan Revolution’: The Communist Party of Malaya’s Struggle for Hearts and Minds in the ‘Second Malayan Emergency’ (1969-1975) (2006)
Ong Wei Chong
117. “From Counter-Society to Counter-State: Jemaah Islamiyah According to PUPJI” (2006)
Elena Pavlova
118. The Terrorist Threat to Singapore’s Land Transportation Infrastructure: A Preliminary Enquiry (2006)
Adam Dolnik
119. The Many Faces of Political Islam (2006)
Mohammed Ayoob
120. Facets of Shi’ite Islam in Contemporary Southeast Asia (I): Thailand and Indonesia (2006)
Christoph Marcinkowski
121. Facets of Shi’ite Islam in Contemporary Southeast Asia (II): Malaysia and Singapore (2006)
Christoph Marcinkowski

122. Towards a History of Malaysian Ulama (2007)
Mohamed Nawab
123. Islam and Violence in Malaysia (2007)
Ahmad Fauzi Abdul Hamid
124. Between Greater Iran and Shi'ite Crescent: Some Thoughts on the Nature of Iran's Ambitions in the Middle East (2007)
Christoph Marcinkowski
125. Thinking Ahead: Shi'ite Islam in Iraq and its Seminaries (hawzah 'ilmiyyah) (2007)
Christoph Marcinkowski
126. The China Syndrome: Chinese Military Modernization and the Rearming of Southeast Asia (2007)
Richard A. Bitzinger
127. Contested Capitalism: Financial Politics and Implications for China (2007)
Richard Carney
128. Sentinels of Afghan Democracy: The Afghan National Army (2007)
Samuel Chan
129. The De-escalation of the Spratly Dispute in Sino-Southeast Asian Relations (2007)
Ralf Emmers
130. War, Peace or Neutrality: An Overview of Islamic Polity's Basis of Inter-State Relations (2007)
Muhammad Haniff Hassan
131. Mission Not So Impossible: The AMM and the Transition from Conflict to Peace in Aceh, 2005–2006 (2007)
Kirsten E. Schulze
132. Comprehensive Security and Resilience in Southeast Asia: ASEAN's Approach to Terrorism and Sea Piracy (2007)
Ralf Emmers
133. The Ulama in Pakistani Politics (2007)
Mohamed Nawab
134. China's Proactive Engagement in Asia: Economics, Politics and Interactions (2007)
Li Mingjiang
135. The PLA's Role in China's Regional Security Strategy (2007)
Qi Dapeng
136. War As They Knew It: Revolutionary War and Counterinsurgency in Southeast Asia (2007)
Ong Wei Chong
137. Indonesia's Direct Local Elections: Background and Institutional Framework (2007)
Nankyung Choi
138. Contextualizing Political Islam for Minority Muslims (2007)
Muhammad Haniff bin Hassan
139. Ngruki Revisited: Modernity and Its Discontents at the Pondok Pesantren al-Mukmin of Ngruki, Surakarta (2007)
Farish A. Noor
140. Globalization: Implications of and for the Modern / Post-modern Navies of the Asia Pacific (2007)
Geoffrey Till

141. Comprehensive Maritime Domain Awareness: An Idea Whose Time Has Come? (2007)
Irvin Lim Fang Jau
142. Sulawesi: Aspirations of Local Muslims (2007)
Rohaiza Ahmad Asi
143. Islamic Militancy, Sharia, and Democratic Consolidation in Post-Suharto Indonesia (2007)
Noorhaidi Hasan
144. Crouching Tiger, Hidden Dragon: The Indian Ocean and The Maritime Balance of Power in Historical Perspective (2007)
Emrys Chew
145. New Security Dimensions in the Asia Pacific (2007)
Barry Desker
146. Japan's Economic Diplomacy towards East Asia: Fragmented Realism and Naïve Liberalism (2007)
Hidetaka Yoshimatsu
147. U.S. Primacy, Eurasia's New Strategic Landscape, and the Emerging Asian Order (2007)
Alexander L. Vuving
148. The Asian Financial Crisis and ASEAN's Concept of Security (2008)
Yongwook RYU
149. Security in the South China Sea: China's Balancing Act and New Regional Dynamics (2008)
Li Mingjiang
150. The Defence Industry in the Post-Transformational World: Implications for the United States and Singapore (2008)
Richard A Bitzinger
151. The Islamic Opposition in Malaysia: New Trajectories and Directions (2008)
Mohamed Fauz Abdul Hamid
152. Thinking the Unthinkable: The Modernization and Reform of Islamic Higher Education in Indonesia (2008)
Farish A Noor
153. Outlook for Malaysia's 12th General Elections (2008)
Mohamed Nawab Mohamed Osman, Shahirah Mahmood and Joseph Chinyong Liow
154. The use of SOLAS Ship Security Alert Systems (2008)
Thomas Timlen
155. Thai-Chinese Relations: Security and Strategic Partnership (2008)
Chulacheeb Chinwanno
156. Sovereignty In ASEAN and The Problem of Maritime Cooperation in the South China Sea (2008)
JN Mak
157. Sino-U.S. Competition in Strategic Arms (2008)
Arthur S. Ding
158. Roots of Radical Sunni Traditionalism (2008)
Karim Douglas Crow
159. Interpreting Islam On Plural Society (2008)
Muhammad Haniff Hassan

160. Towards a Middle Way Islam in Southeast Asia: Contributions of the Gülen Movement (2008)
Mohamed Nawab Mohamed Osman
161. Spoilers, Partners and Pawns: Military Organizational Behaviour and Civil-Military Relations in Indonesia (2008)
Evan A. Laksmama
162. The Securitization of Human Trafficking in Indonesia (2008)
Rizal Sukma
163. The Hindu Rights Action Force (HINDRAF) of Malaysia: Communitarianism Across Borders? (2008)
Farish A. Noor
164. A Merlion at the Edge of an Afrasian Sea: Singapore's Strategic Involvement in the Indian Ocean (2008)
Emrys Chew
165. Soft Power in Chinese Discourse: Popularity and Prospect (2008)
Li Mingjiang
166. Singapore's Sovereign Wealth Funds: The Political Risk of Overseas Investments (2008)
Friedrich Wu
167. The Internet in Indonesia: Development and Impact of Radical Websites (2008)
Jennifer Yang Hui
168. Beibu Gulf: Emerging Sub-regional Integration between China and ASEAN (2009)
Gu Xiaosong and Li Mingjiang
169. Islamic Law In Contemporary Malaysia: Prospects and Problems (2009)
Ahmad Fauzi Abdul Hamid
170. "Indonesia's Salafist Sufis" (2009)
Julia Day Howell
171. Reviving the Caliphate in the Nusantara: Hizbut Tahrir Indonesia's Mobilization Strategy and Its Impact in Indonesia (2009)
Mohamed Nawab Mohamed Osman
172. Islamizing Formal Education: Integrated Islamic School and a New Trend in Formal Education Institution in Indonesia (2009)
Noorhaidi Hasan
173. The Implementation of Vietnam-China Land Border Treaty: Bilateral and Regional Implications (2009)
Do Thi Thuy
174. The Tablighi Jama'at Movement in the Southern Provinces of Thailand Today: Networks and Modalities (2009)
Farish A. Noor
175. The Spread of the Tablighi Jama'at Across Western, Central and Eastern Java and the role of the Indian Muslim Diaspora (2009)
Farish A. Noor
176. Significance of Abu Dujana and Zarkasih's Verdict (2009)
Nurfarahislanda Binte Mohamed Ismail, V. Arianti and Jennifer Yang Hui

177. The Perils of Consensus: How ASEAN's Meta-Regime Undermines Economic and Environmental Cooperation (2009)
Vinod K. Aggarwal and Jonathan T. Chow
178. The Capacities of Coast Guards to deal with Maritime Challenges in Southeast Asia (2009)
Prabhakaran Paleri
179. China and Asian Regionalism: Pragmatism Hinders Leadership (2009)
Li Mingjiang
180. Livelihood Strategies Amongst Indigenous Peoples in the Central Cardamom Protected Forest, Cambodia (2009)
Long Sarou
181. Human Trafficking in Cambodia: Reintegration of the Cambodian illegal migrants from Vietnam and Thailand (2009)
Neth Naro
182. The Philippines as an Archipelagic and Maritime Nation: Interests, Challenges, and Perspectives (2009)
Mary Ann Palma
183. The Changing Power Distribution in the South China Sea: Implications for Conflict Management and Avoidance (2009)
Ralf Emmers
184. Islamist Party, Electoral Politics and Da'wa Mobilization among Youth: The Prosperous Justice Party (PKS) in Indonesia (2009)
Noorhaidi Hasan
185. U.S. Foreign Policy and Southeast Asia: From Manifest Destiny to Shared Destiny (2009)
Emrys Chew
186. Different Lenses on the Future: U.S. and Singaporean Approaches to Strategic Planning (2009)
Justin Zorn
187. Converging Peril : Climate Change and Conflict in the Southern Philippines (2009)
J. Jackson Ewing
188. Informal Caucuses within the WTO: Singapore in the "Invisibles Group" (2009)
Barry Desker
189. The ASEAN Regional Forum and Preventive Diplomacy: A Failure in Practice (2009)
Ralf Emmers and See Seng Tan
190. How Geography Makes Democracy Work (2009)
Richard W. Carney
191. The Arrival and Spread of the Tablighi Jama'at In West Papua (Irian Jaya), Indonesia (2010)
Farish A. Noor
192. The Korean Peninsula in China's Grand Strategy: China's Role in dealing with North Korea's Nuclear Quandary (2010)
Chung Chong Wook
193. Asian Regionalism and US Policy: The Case for Creative Adaptation (2010)
Donald K. Emmerson
194. Jemaah Islamiyah: Of Kin and Kind (2010)
Sulastri Osman

195. The Role of the Five Power Defence Arrangements in the Southeast Asian Security Architecture (2010)
Ralf Emmers
196. The Domestic Political Origins of Global Financial Standards: Agrarian Influence and the Creation of U.S. Securities Regulations (2010)
Richard W. Carney
197. Indian Naval Effectiveness for National Growth (2010)
Ashok Sawhney
198. Exclusive Economic Zone (EEZ) regime in East Asian waters: Military and intelligence-gathering activities, Marine Scientific Research (MSR) and hydrographic surveys in an EEZ (2010)
Yang Fang
199. Do Stated Goals Matter? Regional Institutions in East Asia and the Dynamic of Unstated Goals (2010)
Deepak Nair
200. China's Soft Power in South Asia (2010)
Parama Sinha Palit
201. Reform of the International Financial Architecture: How can Asia have a greater impact in the G20? (2010)
Pradumna R. Rana
202. "Muscular" versus "Liberal" Secularism and the Religious Fundamentalist Challenge in Singapore (2010)
Kumar Ramakrishna
203. Future of U.S. Power: Is China Going to Eclipse the United States? Two Possible Scenarios to 2040 (2010)
Tuomo Kuosa
204. Swords to Ploughshares: China's Defence-Conversion Policy (2010)
Lee Dongmin
205. Asia Rising and the Maritime Decline of the West: A Review of the Issues: IQPC/Asia Rising (2010)
Geoffrey Till
206. From Empire to the War on Terror: The 1915 Indian Sepoy Mutiny in Singapore as a case study of the impact of profiling of religious and ethnic minorities. (2010)
Farish A. Noor